Three women honored by Hadassah-WIZO

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three women who work to make the world a better place were honored at a recent Toronto Hadassah-WIZO annual Women for Women breakfast.

Debbie Field, executive director of FoodShare Metro Toronto; Barbara Turnbull, the Toronto Star reporter who at 18 was paralyzed from the neck down during a convenience store robbery; and Fran Weisberg, a family law and civil litigation attorney, brought thought-provoking messages to almost 300 women attending the Sunday morning event at the Prince Hotel.

Funds raised go to WIZO's Women for Women project, which supports initiatives for women and children in crisis in Israel. To help locally, breakfast attendees brought Canadian Tire money and items such as toiletries to be distributed to the North York Jewish Women's Shelter, the North York Women's Shelter and Yellow Brick House.

Field criticized, albeit apologetically, the notion of food banks. "I think we need to do something not based on handouts of that kind," she said in response to a question.

Every month this year, 150,000 to 160,000 people – of whom six percent are children – will use food banks or hot meal programs in Toronto, Field said. "This did not exist in Canada 20 years ago."

Field decried a "distressing rise in unemployment and a very unfortunate destruction of the social safety net.

"We have to blame ourselves," she said. "We have created a climate in which we think things are too expensive. Canadians' experience of high taxes means they want programs to be cut."

A woman she knows recently had her social assistance cut from $800 to $600 a month. "It means her refrigerator is empty. People are hungry at the end of the month…I don't think the poorest in our society should be the ones who take the brunt of deficit cutting."

Field believes food has come to be viewed as a commodity instead of a key determinant of health. "We advocate not just for low-income people to have more income, but we try to convince people they should put food first."

Her mother, who attended the breakfast and was a Hadassah member, always put food and education before things like toys, Field recalled. "I was raised in a low-income, immigrant home. We never had toys, but we always had food."

Field is a strong proponent of educating people so they can begin to help themselves. Making baby food from scratch, for example, is cheaper and more nutritious and gives parents control over what their children eat, she said.

The highest level of tzedakah, she noted, is to help someone become self-supporting.

Weisberg, in discussing family law issues that affect women, advised women above all not to give up their lives when they marry.

"Maintain your skills and ability to participate in the work force, even if you leave for a small or large period of time.

"If you look at the person sitting at your right and the one sitting at your left, one of the three of you will likely be divorced at least once in your lifetime," Weisberg said.

Among her tips were:
- document any significant gifts received after marriage;
- get assets in your own name;
- always maintain a bank account and credit card in your own name;

Highest level of tzedakah

- know what you're signing;
- if there is strife in the household, get therapeutic counselling for the children. Aside from the obvious reason, if custody ultimately becomes an issue, a therapist can offer a third-party view of what might be in their best interest.
- know your family's financial position at all times.

There are 3.5 million Canadians affected by neurological injury or disease, said Turnbull, who has created the Barbara Turnbull Foundation for Spinal Cord Research.

It is only recently that she has allowed herself to hope that research will allow her to become even more independent, she said.

"Eighty percent of what they know now, they've learned in the last 10 years," said Turnbull, whose autobiography, Looking In the Mirror, was published last year. "Discoveries are happening exponentially."

But government funding is drying up and 85 percent of new ideas go unfunded, Turnbull said. She cited promising nerve graft research undertaken in Sweden a few years ago.

"If we all step in, there's potential for incredible breakthroughs in the next 10 years." Neurological research has implications for those with Multiple Sclerosis, Parkinson, strokes, Alzheimer and brain injuries, she said.

Turnbull, who received a standing ovation, uses a head-controlled wheelchair, from which she can pour water, turn lights on and off, open her door and control her television and VCR at home.

She credits supportive colleagues and modern technology for helping her at work. "Computers don't discriminate," she noted.

Ideal school builds 'Jewish character,' educator says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The aim of a school should be to create an overall human being, not just to teach a lot of facts, says Rabbi Moshe Yeres, the new rosh yeshivah of Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot Girls School.

"My ideal is to build Jewish character," the 43-year-old, Bronx-born rabbi told The CJN in a recent interview.

While Ulpanat Orot (Ulpana) has been doing various chesed projects for a while, the boys have not done very much in an organized sort of way.

(Ulpana and Or Chaim are the separate campuses for boys and girls of Toronto's Bnei Akiva secondary school. Ulpana, which is on Canyon in the Bathurst and Sheppard area, has 130 students, while Or Chaim, on Atmore, has 78.)

Rabbi Moshe Yeres

Bnei Akiva schools have several basic goals, Rabbi Yeres said: to create an atmosphere where young, religiously committed boys and girls can grow intellectually, emotionally and religiously; to offer a dual curriculum to give students the tools to become self-sufficient in Jewish texts, while at the same time receiving a good grounding in classical world disciplines; to deepen a commitment to the land and the people of Israel; and to encourage students to continue their religious studies in Israel after completing their studies here.

While the boys study more Gemarah, the girls concentrate on Tanach (the Bible) and Hebrew, he explained. Both study the oral law, Torah, emunah (doctrines of faith) and Navi (Prophets) as "integral parts of a complete Jewish education."

Secular subjects are the same at both campuses, and the schools share pretty much the same staff.

Rabbi Yeres, a firm advocate of segregated education, notes that "one of the indisputable requirements for the effective study of Torah is an atmosphere unencumbered by ancillary distractions. Youngsters should be removed from the pressures indigenous to a co-ed environment."

The school is committed to Ivrit, Hebrew, as the language of instruction, the rabbi said. Since it recognizes that some students are weak in the language, the former rosh yeshivah, Rabbi Shlomo Gemara, instituted an ulpan for first year students, in which they are given additional time to master Hebrew.

This also helps those students deal with the fact that "the majority of the religious studies staff are Israeli shlichim, whose lingua franca is Hebrew."

Rabbi Yeres enjoys having direct contact with the students. Besides teaching a course in Talmud, he tries to periodically teach different classes.

Some of these classes, he said, are on specific topics, while others, he added with a grin, are "shmoozes," an opportunity for the students to talk to him informally about what is concerning them.

New day school to serve downtown Jewish community

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The new arts-based Downtown Jewish Day School will open next September in the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), its board president said at a recent informational meeting.

The school plans to start with one senior kindergarten class and either two separate grade one and two classes or one combined class with "ideally" no more than 20 students each, Dr. Cynthia Lazar told parents.

Twenty-five deposits for September registration have been received, and the board hopes to have at least 40 children enrolled by September, she said, adding that some parents are so confident the school will open, they missed other day schools' Feb. 1st deposit deadlines.

Modeled on the Toronto Heschel School, now in its second year at the Beth David Synagogue, the non-affiliated school intends to serve the approximately 15,000 to 20,000 Jews living south of St. Clair Ave, Lazar told The CJN.

"[Vaughan has] more than four day schools for about 40,000 people. We just want one for 15,000 people," the 35 year-old Clarke Institute psychiatrist and mother of two said. "[Downtown has] a big enough community to support one small school."

She expects the school to grow over seven years to 180 students from senior kindergarten to grade 8.

The initial student body will draw from current JCC nursery students, as well as children living too far from uptown schools and those unable to get on lengthy waiting lists for schools south of Lawrence, she said.

Planning for the school began in November, 1996 when a group of parents with children in the Bloor JCC nursery began considering alternatives to uptown day schools, Lazar said.

The school will initially use four vacant classrooms – as well as JCC athletic facilities and after-school programs – and will gain more space as part of upcoming JCC renovations.

The school's 13-member board recently hired former She'arim principal Dori Levine as education consultant to help develop a curriculum.

Although details are not finalized, the curriculum will integrate secular and Judaic studies – like Hebrew literature, Tanach and, in later grades, Talmud – with an arts-based approach to learning, Lazar said.

Arts based approach

Judaic and secular studies are intermingled throughout the day and visual arts and music are used as teaching aids for both, Lazar said. It may also mean teaching some secular subjects in Hebrew and some Judaic subjects, like Jewish History, in English, she added.

"[An arts-based approach] doesn't mean that [students] are just sitting there drawing pictures all day and don't learn how to read," Lazar told parents.

She said half-day Hebrew immersion will not be offered, but the school's goal is Hebrew fluency by grade 8.

The school will also help students develop "a commitment to social action" in both the Jewish and wider communities, and will promote a "nurturing environment" with a curriculum and teachers that respond dynamically to individual student needs, Lazar said.

"The idea is not to be pressured, not to have a pressure-cooker of an institution," board member and religious adviser Rabbi Chezi Zionce of the Brunswick Ave. First Narayever Congregation told parents.

Lazar and Levine both stressed the curriculum will be set in conjunction with the school's teachers and the Board of Jewish Education.

"It's really premature to write [the curriculum] before teachers are hired," Lazar said.

Lazar admits finding qualified teachers, the board's top priority, is a "tall order," since they must be fluent in both Hebrew and English and be able to teach both Judaic and secular studies.

However, Lazar told parents teachers have already approached the board about working at the school, since "teachers like Dori a lot and want to work with her."

The board hopes to have two teachers per class, although finances may necessitate having one teacher and a teaching assistant. In older grades, it's expected some teachers will rotate between classrooms to capitalize on different strengths.

Religiously, the school's observance will be similar to the First Nareyever Congregation, which Lazar describes as "egalitarian traditional."

For instance, wearing kippot will be mandatory for both boys and girls, as will daily prayer and in-school kashrut.

However, different levels of family observance will be respected in an atmosphere of "no judging," she added.

Eating disorders: reducing the risks

Last week, in conjunction with National Eating Disorder Awareness Week, we began a four-part series by looking at eating disorders within the Jewish community.

Part two examines the risks and what we can do to reduce them. Next week: How anorexia is affecting one teenager and her family.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dr. Leora Pinhas

TORONTO — There's no vaccine to inoculate young people against eating disorders like anorexia nervosa and bulimia nervosa, but there are ways to reduce the risks of developing the life-threatening illnesses.

Dr. Allan Kaplan, head of the program for eating disorders at the Toronto Hospital, says he wouldn't put his 9-year-old daughter in competitive ballet classes (because of the undue focus on weight and shape), and he "never gets into a power struggle around eating" with his children.

He recommends that parents focus self-worth on people themselves – not on what they do, and advises parents of overweight girls to "make sure you tell her you love her.

"Don't ever put your child on a diet. That's the worst thing you can do. Diets don't work. They make people crazy. They create a situation where the child feels her acceptance will depend on how she looks."

Kaplan is critical of ballet schools that "actively promote eating disordered behavior" by regularly weighing students and even distributing laxatives.

Canada's National Ballet School stopped weighing students at least a decade ago, said a spokesperson for the school. The focus at the Toronto-based institution is now on "the healthy dancer" and any change in a student's diet must be approved by a nutritionist affiliated with the school.

In Ontario alone, over 70,000 women are estimated to suffer from clinical eating disorders, according to the National Eating Disorder Information Centre (NEDIC). In 10 to 20 percent of cases, the illness is fatal, but even patients who recover may be left with serious health problems like heart damage and osteoporosis.

Precipitating factors show up early. By Grade 3, forty percent of girls think they should be thinner, regardless of their weight, according to NEDIC.

The average age of onset for anorexia is 14 or 15; for bulimia, in late adolescence or early adulthood. The illness can persist for decades.

Anorexia is characterized by drastic weight loss from excessive dieting; bulimia by uncontrollable binge eating followed by purging through self-induced vomiting, laxative abuse, excessive exercising or fasting. Both disorders involve a distorted body image, with the patient believing she is fat even when grotesquely underweight.

Although males also succumb to eating disorders, it is an illness that afflicts mostly females.

Eliminating the risks is virtually impossible, because some factors are simply beyond our control.

But evidence of a healthier trend can be seen in a national advertising campaign with the theme Look Good On Your Own Terms, launched last September by Kellogg Canada.

A current television commercial for Special K breakfast cereal features men obsessing about their weight. "I have my mother's thighs," says one. "I have to accept that."

The spot "strives to demonstrate how ridiculous some of the comments about body image sound" and "draws attention to the fact that men don't seem to worry about these things, so why should women?" according to a Kellogg Canada news release.

"When it comes to body image, we have to be able to accept more than one version of what an attractive person is," says psychologist Dr. Howard Steiger, chief of service at the eating disorders program at Montreal's Douglas Hospital.

Allowing children to be themselves puts them at less risk, he says. "When parents need their children to be some kind of extension of themselves, it invariably puts pressure on their kids."

Among the most common mistakes parents make is transmitting their own unhealthy attitudes, Steiger says.

"They reach for dessert and say, 'I shouldn't.' They may show too much concern about children's weight gain or dietary habits. They may indirectly be doing that in other areas too. They could be overconcerned about marks, school, social acceptance. If somebody's already anxious, they need someone who's calm.

"Parents have to show trust...that their child will come to be able to deal with this...Sometimes it takes courage to say, 'That's good enough. I don't have to be the best at everything."

Dr. Miriam Kaufman, a pediatrician at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and co-author of All Shapes and Sizes, says parents should not talk about being fat or hating their bodies, even when their children are very small. "I think they internalize it."

If children hear other people make negative comments based on appearance, Kaufman suggests parents provide balance by saying something like, "But she's got great ideas," or, "Isn't that silly? Why do you think she would say something like that?"

At the same time, she feels it's appropriate to "let our kids know we think they're attractive.

"In an ideal world, we wouldn't care about physical appearance," she sighs. She cautions that comments about specific features could lead girls to think the other features aren't attractive. "You also have to be conscious it's not the only nice thing you're saying to your kid, and that you don't do more of it with one than another."

Dr. Miriam Kaufman

She believes it's possible to be overweight and healthy and notes that "a significant part of the population" who have eating disorders had been teased about being fat by friends, parents and even grandparents.

"I think it's helpful to talk about why people need to eat appropriately, and why fat is not bad."

Eating disorders usually start very innocently. Typically, a girl starts to diet, says Dr. Leora Pinhas, director of the eating disorders treatment program at Newmarket's York County Hospital and a fellow in Child and Adolescent Psychiatry at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

"You cut out all your junk food, you lose a few pounds and someone compliments you. Then you cut out all the fat, and you get a few more compliments. You think, 'I could do even more.'

"Once you start reducing your calories, it starts to affect how you think. Your brain requires a lot of nutrients. It starts to feel like you have to keep doing this. It's like every calorie is poison."

While dieting itself isn't indicative of a psychiatric problem, Pinhas believes teenage girls who start to diet are "expressing some distress over moving from childhood to adulthood and what it means to be a woman in our culture."

Parents may be the last to know their child has an eating disorder. Sometimes they end up in a hospital emergency room after an episode of fainting or dizziness. Patients work very hard to hide their symptoms, says Pinhas.

Certain types of family dynamics allow the patients to hide for a long time, notes Kaufman.

Somehow, the final version of last week's article on eating disorders didn't make it to print.

The next-to-final version that appeared had two errors:

There was no sidebar on Dr. Leora Pinhas' study on Jewish high school girls. We will report on her study when the results are in.

Kosher food is available at the Montreal hospital where Alana Hirschberg was treated, although it was not available to her at the time of her treatment.

The danger signs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sometimes parents are the last to know when their child is developing an eating disorder.

Some of the danger signs, compiled from diverse sources, are:

- noticeable weight loss in anorexia, frequent weight fluctuation in bulimia (weight loss may not be excessive in youngsters who are still growing);
- avoiding eating with the family;
- the adoption of a strict vegan diet without the accompanying ideology, and avoiding fat that would occur in that diet;
- guilt or shame about eating;
- becoming extremely knowledgeable about eating disorders, then denying they have one because a certain aspect doesn't apply to them;
- irregular menstruation or loss of periods;
- over-exercising;
- excessive concern about weight, shape and calories;
- mood changes;
- "going ballistic" when parents refuse permission to start a diet.

Warning signs specific to bulimia include:

- large quantities of food disappearing;
- money disappearing;
- evidence of laxative use;
- shoplifting food;
- scars or redness of the knuckles (caused by using fingers to force vomiting);
- possible swelling of the parotid glands (as in mumps).

Singers on Cloud 9 after concert

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eighteen doctors, dentists, accountants, computer experts and businesspeople are floating a foot off the ground these days.

The men, under the direction of Harvey Erlich, formed a choir that backed up headliners Mordechai Ben David, Dedi and Israeli child star Amit Listvand, as well as the Neginah Orchestra, at the annual concert of the Hebrew Academy for Special Children (HASC), which provides a school in New York and a camp in the Catskills, both for severely handicapped children.

Over 4,000 people filled the hall, which was sold out over a month before the concert, with scalpers doing an active business. It was the first time the Met has allowed anything other than a ballet or opera to be held there.

Erlich, a dentist, has been active on the Jewish religious music scene since he himself was a child. He told The CJN that David Golding, of Suki and Ding, a record producing team, asked him to organize a choir to appear at the concert.

"He knew me from my work as director of the Toronto Pirchei Choir," Erlich said modestly, not mentioning his almost non-stop work with both adult and children's religious musical programming.

With the help of Heshi Kuhnreich, Erlich said, he chose 20 men who had appeared in other adult choirs, including at the Toronto Daf Yomi siyum in the fall. In the end, 17 took part, as some could not spare the time either to practise or to go to New York for the concert.

"We didn't get the program until the middle of December," Erlich said, "so we had three weeks to listen to the music and practise."

The music was sent to Erlich by the organizers and he duplicated the music if it was possible, or invented their own if necessary.

Practices were held in the physiotherapy room of the MedCare office at Bathurst and Steeles and at Erlich's house, and the dress rehearsal was at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"For three weeks, we practised every night after work from nine until late, late at night," Erlich said.

But the effort was worth it, he said. They were well received by the audience, the performers they backed up and the musical director of the evening, Yisroel Lamm. They have been asked to perform at next year's concert, as well as at the Israel at 50 production at the Toronto Trade Centre, to be held on Yom Ha'atzmaut this year.

While the group was not paid for their appearance ("We were glad to do this for HASC," Erlich said), the organizers flew them and their wives to New York, billeted them in a hotel and "wined and dined us during our short stay."

An emotional Erlich described the thrill of the evening: "They [the choir members] may be physicians, dentists, lawyers, accountants, computer consultants or fellow entrepreneurs in our community, but for one shining moment, they were stars at the Met. Toronto, you can be proud."

The school run by HASC is largely supported by government funds, but the camp's budget has been slashed due to government cutbacks. The money raised at the concert enabled 35 more children to attend the camp.

Besides camping experiences, the facility offers occupational, physical and speech therapy, adaptive aquatics and physical education instructors, a social worker, a music therapist and medical and child care staff.

A press release from HASC says that the program "services mentally retarded, neurologically impaired, emotionally disturbed and autistic individuals from age two to 21, and those above 21 are part of the Young Adults Program."

Parents can help reduce the chance of eating disorders notice changes like drastic weight loss, she points out.

"If you come from a family where someone does your shopping and you don't know your daughter hasn't used any pads or tampons in six months, those can [also] be things that prevent parents from realizing."

Sometimes a girl's friends are the first to figure out that dieting has turned dangerous. Beth Feffer, manager of Jewish Family and Child Services' York Region branch and its school outreach program, would advise youngsters who suspect a friend has an eating disorder to let them know they're concerned, but not to bug them.

"If they think the family does not know or if what the girl is doing is dangerous to her health, [they should] inform the girl's parents they're concerned and that they think she's not eating right and should get some help." Feffer says people should be prepared that such an approach may be met with anger and resentment.

"I think it's true that nothing will convince anyone of anything until they're ready," said Steiger. "All we can do is provide frank information and be upfront."

If there is a problem, it's important to see a family doctor first to rule out illnesses like Crohn's or lupus, says Kaufman.

Pinhas adds a warning: "There are still family doctors who don't understand the danger of putting kids on diets. The thing about diets is, there's a slippery slope. If you diet long enough and hard enough, it's almost impossible not to end up with an eating disorder."

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Just a Second Shop, a community-sponsored store that offers gently-used clothing and household goods, has moved to new, brighter quarters.

It is now located at Bathurst and York Downs, near Richmond's Bakery.

Previous locations were at Bathurst and Lawrence, when it opened in 1982, and Bathurst and Ranee.

The Just a Second Shop is under the aegis of Jewish Family & Child Service. Florence Weinberger, executive assistant at the agency, said the idea for such a store began when agency clients in financial difficulties noted that they needed clothes.

"Rather than increase financial grants [to cover the cost of more clothes], we decided to open a store, where they could get good quality, clean clothing at very low cost."

In fact, she said, agency clients can shop there for free, although some prefer to pay a small amount. The whole point is to ensure that they maintain their dignity, she said.

The front of the store is covered in windows, which lets the light in, giving an airy, spacious look. It boasts change rooms, back door access for donors to drop off goods, a place for sorting, an office with kitchen facilities, and good parking.

The move has increased the clientele because it is now easily accessible to those who live further north.

"And not just Jews, or even just poor people, come here," Weinberger said – it is open to everyone.

The agency also operates a furniture bank.

One mother, a client of JF&CS, went there to get clothes for her young children, and was very proud that when they outgrew them, she brought them back. "When my boys no longer wear an item, I can simply drop it off and give back to the community," she was reported to have said.

The Just a Second Shop is located at 4117 Bathurst St. Donations of new and gently used clothing in infant to adult sizes as well as books and household items are very much appreciated, Weinberger said.

Hours are Monday to Thursday, 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. for donations, and 11 a.m.to 6 p.m. for shopping; and Sundays, 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. for donations, and 11 a.m.to 3 p.m. for shopping. It is closed Friday and Saturday.

Cho Yung honey: the medicine of the future

Discovered in China, tested in Israel, potent natural preventative now available in Canada

The story I'm about to tell you is so incredible that I can hardly believe it myself . . . but I swear to G-d, it's absolutely true.

Some 15 years ago, I was flying from Japan to my native Israel in my private plane when I encountered engine problems and had to make an emergency landing in China. I landed in a farmer's field and was greeted by an elderly but very fit-looking man. Using sign language and the few words of Chinese I knew, I was able to communicate with him and make arrangements to refuel in the nearby village.

What really amazed me, beyond the warm welcome I received from the locals, was how fit and radiant they all looked. Young and old people alike were the picture of health — slim, active, and with the most beautiful complexions I had ever seen. I met people who were 120 but looked 70 by our standards.

Being naturally inquisitive, I wanted to know why . . . so I asked point-blank, with apologies for my directness, what it was that allowed them to enjoy such perfect health.

The farmer who had greeted me led me to a small valley, and showed me a plant with bright red flowers. The flowers, he explained, contained a type of honey with it.

The results surpassed even my wildest expectations. Common ailments like hemorrhoids, fungal infections, ulcers, asthma, skin disorders, liver problems — even bedwetting! — improved dramatically or disappeared altogether. Subjects also experienced a concurrent increase in energy level and well-being.

[illegible] should enjoy good health since they lived a rural lifestyle in a subtropical paradise and were not exposed to pollution. So with their permission I took a sample of the honey — and the plant on which the bees deposited it — back to the Technion Institute in Haifa for testing.

I immediately had more honey flown in, along with the plants. I transplanted a few of them and waited for nature to take its course.

To my chagrin, [illegible] attempts to reproduce the wild flowers in Israel failed — meaning I had to go back to China.

Jewish student group busy at Harvard

By KARYNNE NAFTOLIN
The Jewish Advocate Staff

CAMBRIDGE — Joe Grahame grew up in London in a nonobservant family that had little connection to the Jewish community.

In 1996, however, when he participated in a trip to Poland and visited the concentration camps, a desire to be connected with his Jewish heritage emerged.

"When I got back, I made a choice to become more involved in Judaism and [in the] community," said Grahame, 29.

A graduate of the London School of Economics and an entrepreneur, Grahame arrived in Cambridge in September 1996, three months before he was set to begin his studies at the Harvard Business School (HBS). With little to do in the interim, he went to several Harvard Hillel events and became involved in the business school's Jewish Students Association (JSA) even before he began taking classes. Now Grahame is one of three co-presidents of the JSA.

Out of the about 1,800 students at HBS, Grahame estimates that 15 percent are Jewish, hailing from all over the world, including Europe, the Middle East and Africa.

The JSA holds several programs each month, including lectures by local Jewish business personalities, Shabbat dinners, cocktail parties or the annual break-the-fast party after Yom Kippur. Recent events have included talks by Aaron Feuerstein, CEO of Malden Mills, and Michael Hammer, a writer and consultant.

Last year, the JSA brought journalist J.J. Goldberg, author of Jewish Power: Inside the American-Jewish Establishment, and Harvey Krueger, vice chair of Lehman Brothers.

Currently linked with the HBS alumni group in Tel Aviv, the group is contemplating the formation of a JSA alumni club to reach out to Jewish HBS graduates worldwide, said Grahame.

The JSA, Grahame said, links its members with Jewish graduate students in Cambridge, across the river from the business school in Boston, by maintaining connections with the graduate student group at the Harvard Hillel. A future will include Jewish graduate students from several universities.

According to Grahame, the JSA does not receive funding from HBS or from Harvard Hillel, instead, depending entirely on an annual membership fee of $25 and private donations. Fees charged for specific events cover those expenses, he said. JSA members are notified about the latest speakers and events by e-mail.

Home is always the first choice.

Unemployment high among Outremont Chassidim

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A rare survey of the Outremont Chassidim and Ultra-Orthodox reveals a high level of unemployment and poverty, particularly among younger people who seem less capable of providing for large families than an older generation.

Among men aged 25-64, less than 80 percent were employed full time, while another eight percent had part-time work. Thirty percent of men aged 17-24 were unemployed. Overall, only 62.2 percent of men were employed full time.

Young men are spending long periods in religious study and coming out with few marketable skills and little know-how about making a living. Thirty-one percent have only a high school diploma, and 20 percent didn't finish high school.

Interestingly, older men, age 45-64 were more likely to have higher levels of education, to have an undergraduate degree or above, than those 25-44.

"For many of the men in the sample, work is not valued as a means to develop a career path, or to gain personal satisfaction. Rather, it is necessary to provide materially for their family, but a distraction from the more important duties of religious study and observance," the survey states.

"It is possible some of the younger men may not yet have completed their secular studies. It is also possible (they) are less concerned with secular studies than are the older men, reflecting a shift in younger generations to greater levels of piety."

Opening stores or small businesses, traditional routes for those with no profession, are seen as less attractive than in the past, with the spin-off that there are fewer employers within the community.

Working outside their enclave was not easy for many apparently. Fully 85 percent felt their language skills were too limited (generally meaning French, but often English, too). Thirty percent said it was because they can't work on Saturday, followed by "anti-Semitism" (17.8 percent) and their way of dress (14.9 percent).

Fifteen percent of women were working full time and another 34.7 percent part time.

Over 40 percent of respondents were found to live near or below the government poverty level – twice the rate of the Montreal Jewish community as a whole.

Three-quarters reported total household incomes of less than $50,000 even though many households have seven or more members. Twenty-four percent said they made under $20,000.

The survey's authors caution that respondents probably understated their income, but even making allowances for that, conclude that poverty is a real problem in these communities.

The single biggest concern among respondents was, indeed, financial difficulties. Two-thirds cited money as either of major or some concern, well ahead of other leading concerns like unemployment, deciding on what type of work to do, managing home and work, and housing problems.

Vocational guidance

The survey was commissioned by the Coalition of Outremont Hassidic Organizations (COHO), with grants from the federal government and the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Montreal. Research coordinator was Charles Shahar, demographer at FEDERATION CJA, and Prof. Morton Weinfeld and Randal Schnoor, of McGill University's sociology department, were authors.

A total of 387 individuals filled out the questionnaire, which was distributed to 1,235 households in Outremont and surrounding areas. These groups have an estimated total population of 6,250. The study also included interviews with 20 prominent community members. (Not included are the Lubavitch and Tash Chassidim who live outside the area.)

In the introduction, Chana Werzberger, suggests the Chassidim are finding it difficult to maintain their traditional insularity and self-reliance. Several factors are threatening this way of life.The young are having more children than their parents. The poor economy has reduced charitable donations. Businesses within the communities are downsizing or closing.

"The Chassidim of today are cognizant of the fact that, while they are different from the society around them, they are still part of that society. The historical concept of regarding all governments with suspicion and fear has diminished...Chassidim are fully prepared to participate in the political process, and to use the larger society's resources to satisfy the community's needs," she writes.

Among the proposed solutions is an institution where Chassidim can receive job training and vocational guidance within their own milieu, and businesses that do exist can receive help to be more competitive.

As one interviewee puts it: "We need a place where Chassids could learn a profession and wouldn't have to go out to the secular word...Since they were a child they have been protected...We need a heimish college."

Their was a high interest among respondents to improving skills, specifically in computer, French and English, and accounting.

Their was a strong sense that neither existing Jewish nor government agencies are responding to the vocational needs of these communities.

Families are are much larger than the Jewish average: half of the surveyed had household of five or more and almost 10 percent had at least 10. These communities are growing not only by their birthrate, but by immigration. More than a quarter came to Montreal since 1985, most from the United States, typically for marriage.

Yiddish was the mother tongue of half, while the great majority described themselves as fluent in English. Only 10 percent said they are fluent in French, and a quarter said they cannot speak it at all.

Other concerns expressed including the need for child care help, especially post-natal; care for the elderly; and mental health care that is culturally sensitive.

למטה איתי,
טיפסתי על הר
וראיתי את דמותי
נשקפת בשלג
שבמורד,
ואז סחפה מפולת
והכל אבד.

אני חי בפחד
שמא יאבד היחד
כי בניתי את חיי מסביבך
החדשים עוברים,
הילדים כבר מתבגרים
גם אנחנו כבר לא צעירים,
אז קחי נא את אהבתי
למטה איתך,

"עפולה אקספרס"-יהורם פירוצקי

Jewish family services agency opens in Victoria

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — Victoria's first Jewish family services agency is ready for business.

Alex Van Borek, board chair of The Greater Victoria Jewish Family Service Society said the city has never had "a single Jewish social agency to offer assessment, referral and counselling assistance to all members of the Jewish community regardless of their affiliation."

The Jewish Federation of Victoria and Vancouver Island identified a need for the agency in a survey prepared by Jean Gerber of Vancouver. Federation initiated a committee to organize the service in September, 1995.

Van Borek said the agency's main function is to provide assessment and referral for Jewish and non-Jewish islanders.

Hilary Hayes, the agency's coordinator, assesses clients' needs, refers them to appropriate local agencies and advocates on their behalf. She will also gather and train volunteers, raise funds, and secure office equipment.

"A person in trouble needs to know what services are available, and the key Jewish people that can provide help. Hilary will provide the interface between people in need and the information on where their needs can be met," Van Borek said.

The agency's long-range goals include providing counselling as well as community and family education, said Hayes, who runs the consulting firm Hayes and Associates. Eventually, outreach programs such as a kosher Meals on Wheels may also be offered.

Start-up funds from federation currently allow the agency to operate eight hours a week. The society will require additional hours and funds if there is a need for more services.

Van Borek considers "the first few months a test to see what the demand is. If needed, we will expand our hours."

Topping the list of office items required are a 486 or Pentium computer and a sophisticated answering machine. "We'll need to be able to respond to and check for calls daily," Van Borek explained.

He said that a fax machine and office furniture would also be helpful, as well as an overhead projector, VCR and tape recorder for community presentations, and kitchen items.

"Volunteers are especially needed during the day," Van Borek added. Volunteers will participate in the agency recruitment process as well as receive appropriate training and support.

If you have items to donate or time to spare, or for more information, call the agency's interim number, 250-384-9849 or e-mail [hilary_hayes@bc.sympatico.ca.]

Vancouver Talmud Torah prepares for 50th birthday

By DAVID LITVAK
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Talmud Torah, Vancouver's oldest Jewish day school, is celebrating its 50th anniversary in April with a weekend of festivities for the community and for alumni from across North America.

David Paperny, a Talmud Torah parent and an Oscar-nominated documentary filmmaker, is preparing a video highlighting the school's achievements.

Solly Kaplinksi, headmaster and former director of education of United Synagogue Day Schools in Toronto, says, "It is a happy coincidence that the 50th anniversary of the Vancouver Talmud Torah is taking place during the same year that Israel is celebrating its 50th birthday."

The school has approximately 500 students (which represents a growth of 10 percent over last year) and a faculty of 45, and according to Kaplinski, "it caters to the whole ideological spread of the Jewish community."

The school, which serves students from nursery to Grade 7, offers a curriculum that includes Judaica and general studies courses, as well as a wide variety of extracurricular activities.

Kaplinski notes that over 30 percent of the parents of Talmud Torah students are immigrants from such countries as the former Soviet Union, the former Yugoslavia, South American countries, Israel, South Africa and India. "This mix enriches the culture of our school enormously because people bring their own cultural background into the educational milieu," says Kaplinksi, a native of South Africa and former headmaster of United Herzlia Schools in Capetown.

This summer, the school is undertaking a partnership with the Hebrew University in Jerusalem which will enable the faculty to spend the next three summers at the university. They will focus on new methodologies, and bring the ruach of Israel into the school and the community. An Israel experience for the graduates is also in the works.

The school has invested in a technology resource information centre that allows students and teachers to access the World Wide Web.

The Talmud Torah is making its computer centre available to affiliated agencies in the Jewish community. "We don't adopt a narrow, parochial view of Jewish education. We see ourselves as building community. The school plans to reach out through the Internet to Jewish communities beyond Vancouver who don't have access to a Jewish education."

Kaplinksi has been involved in the launching of a western Canadian coalition of Jewish day schools to share in curriculum resources, scholars in residence and teacher exchanges. Western Canadian Jewish youngsters will be coming together for Shabbatonim and a variety of cultural and sporting activities.

After 50 years, Kaplinksi says, "we can't sit back on our laurels. This is one of the most exciting times for Talmud Torah, the Vancouver Jewish community and especially our children."

Unity, tolerance urged at Federation meeting

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Calls for unity, tolerance and acceptance of our diversity marked the recent Hamilton-Wentworth and Area Jewish Federation annual general meeting at the Jewish Community Centre.

In his opening d'var Torah, Rabbi Gary Karlin of the Conservative Beth Jacob Congregation stressed the need for Diaspora Jews to work together for the good of the community, regardless of religious affiliation.

Rabbi Morton Green of the Orthodox Adas Israel Congregation, who installed Cheryl Greenbaum as president, agreed.

"Federation," said Rabbi Green, "serves a very vital service in our community."

He praised Greenbaum, immediate past United Jewish Appeal (UJA) co-chair and the first Orthodox woman to head the federation, for her community involvement and as a person who is intelligent, has leadership qualities, believes in traditional values and has raised her children accordingly.

"We are a committed, united, strong community," Greenbaum said in her response, adding that she looks forward to the challenge of working with all organizations to build a community for the future.

Dr. Judah Denburg and Dr. Adele Reinhartz, co-founders of Midrasha, the continuing Jewish education program for high school students, reported on the success of the program, which is now in its fourth year and is intended as the forerunner to a community high school.

Denburg spoke of the need for a high school for all Jewish students regardless of religious affiliation, noting also that "serious discussions" regarding the establishment of a second, [non-religious] day school are continuing.

Outgoing president George Czutrin announced the establishment by the Goldblatt family of the Abby Goldblatt Distinguished Citizen Award in memory of Abby Goldblatt.

Other reports were given by executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel, 1998 UJA chair Allen Rams, treasurer William Halpren and Jewish Social Services (JSS) chair Jack Leon. UJA women's division co-chair Bonnie Loewith spoke about the UJA Mission to Azerbaijan and past president, David Steinberg presented the new federation and JSS boards.

Winnipeg congregation planning move to old theatre

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Beth Jacob Congregation will soon have a new home.

The synagogue members were dispossessed last June when the sale of the Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate/Talmud Torah-I.L. Peretz School building that housed the synagogue was sold to a Christian group. The synagogue members temporarily moved their services to the nearby Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre while they searched for a permanent new home.

Beth Jacob treasurer Harry Garfinkel reports that the deal to buy the 5,100-square-foot Hyland was just the first hurdle though. The congregation has to come up with more funding to redo the interior of the building and turn it from a movie theatre into a synagogue and community centre.

"We are looking at different funding options," Garfinkel says. "We don't have a time frame for moving in yet."

Garfinkel estimates that the congregation has about 150 to 175 members and supporters. For the time being, they will continue to holding services at the Gwen Secter Centre.

Day schools forge Western Canada union

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Uzi Rivlin, the director of Judaic Studies at the Gray Academy of Jewish Education in Winnipeg, has forged a union of all the Jewish day schools in Western Canada.

"It is a wonderful achievement," he says. "We include the entire ideological and religious spectrum. Jerusalem recognizes our union."

An educator for many years in New York and Israel, Rivlin assumed his position in Winnipeg at the start of the new school year. He began working on the project in September. Representatives of 10 of the 12 schools involved met to form the union in Edmonton on Oct. 30. Also in attendance was a world Jewish education official from Israel.

"It was difficult having our educational needs met from Montreal or Toronto," Rivlin explains. "People in Montreal and Toronto don't really know or understand our situations and it is a long way to go from Vancouver or Calgary to Montreal or Toronto."

Variety of educational exchanges on the drawing board

Some of the programs being planned, Rivlin says, are teacher and student exchanges between the schools, joint staff and material development, and a separate Bible competition for Western Canada with the winner representing Western Canada in the International Bible Contest in Jerusalem in April.

The first western Canadian representative will be Ruth Glinter, a 15-year-old Joseph Wolinsky (the high school component of the Gray Academy) student who has been one of the representatives from Western Canada to the Canadian competitions for three of the past four years.

Regular meetings of representatives of the western Canadian schools will be held monthly, each time in a different city.

U.S. seems to back away from earlier stance

Israel's right to retaliate against Iraq recognized

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. Defence Secretary William Cohen seemed to back down last Sunday from his earlier appeal to Israel not to retaliate in the event of an Iraqi attack, telling reporters "Israel obviously has the right of self-defence and will exercise that right as they see fit."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai met with Cohen aboard his plane at Munich Airport for more than an hour Sunday to discuss the Iraqi crisis.

But although Cohen apparently acknowledged Israel's right to retaliate, senior security sources said he told Mordechai the United States would still prefer that Israel allow it to operate alone.

Mordechai was accompanied to Germany by Defence Ministry director-general Ilan Biran and his military aide, Brig.-Gen. Benjamin Ami-Dror.

Israeli soldiers from the Golani infantry brigade wear their gas masks while packed into the back of an armored personnel carrier during winter training exercises last week. [RNS/Reuters]

Cohen said only that Mordechai had asked for some items that could help Israel with security and that the United States is reviewing types of assistance. He did not elaborate.

At Sunday's weekly cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu discussed the crisis, saying there is no change in the assessment that the probability of Israel being attacked is low, according to an official communique.

Netanyahu was to convene a special high-level meeting Monday to further discuss the issue. Beforehand, he was to confer with Mordechai, Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, Agriculture Minister Rafael Eitan, and Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon on the latest developments.

James Baker III, who was U.S. secretary of state during the Gulf War, told Channel 2 that he expects Israel to retaliate this time if attacked by Iraq.

"If Israel is on the receiving end of an attack...it would be my expectation that she would probably retaliate," Baker said. "It would be my expectation – but it's only a guess – that the American government would not stand in the way of that retaliation," he added. "This time things are different."

Baker added that even during the Gulf War, the United States was "not confident" that Israel would heed its call to stay out of the conflict.

Iraq's inventory detailed

UN weapons inspectors are concerned that "Iraq may still have operational Scud-type missiles with chemical and biological warheads.

"Critical missile components, warheads and propellants are not accounted for," it says. "Nor are 17 tons of growth media for biological weapons – enough to produce more than three times the amount of anthrax Iraq admits it had." Saddam initially admitted Iraq had produced 169 gallons of anthrax; the accepted figure is now nearly 2,200 gallons.

"Key items of chemical weapons production equipment are also missing," says the document, noting that the UN weapons inspectors "strongly suspect that admitted Iraqi figures for the production of biological weapons agents are still too low."

Also unaccounted for are:

- Some 4,000 tons of chemical weapons precursors, sufficient to produce several hundred tons of chemical weapons agents, which could fill several thousand munitions;
- Over 31,000 chemical weapons munitions; and
- Over 600 tons of VX precursors, which could produce 200 tons of VX nerve gas. One drop of VX can kill a person, 200 tons could wipe out the entire population of the word.

Iraq has four plants that have been used to produce chemical weapons munitions and 30 which could be converted to produce chemical weapons materials. "These factories cannot be destroyed because they have legitimate alternative civilian uses," notes the document, "but it is important that they are monitored closely."

Without monitoring, it warns, Iraq could produce chemical and biological weapons in weeks, a long-range missile in a year and nuclear weapons in five years.

In addition, it could produce up to 91 gallons of weapons-grade anthrax each week – enough to fill two warheads – and it could also produce mustard chemical weapons agents within weeks.

The document also details episodes to support its charges of "Iraqi deceit, concealment, harassment, and obstruction:"

- Iraq claimed that its VX nerve gas project had failed, but UN inspectors discovered Iraq had developed the capability to produce VX on an industrial scale and had, in fact, produced four tons of the nerve gas.
- Iraq was working on a number of other agents, including sarin, tabun and mustard gas.
- Iraq claimed that the huge al-Hakam factory was used to produce animal feed, but in fact it was found to be used for manufacturing biological weapons and had produced 13,000 gallons of anthrax and botulinum. Even a much smaller amount of anthrax released from the top of a tall building could kill up to three million people.
- Iraq, despite denials, was found to have produced over 4,900 gallons of botulinum, nearly 2,200 gallons of anthrax, 572 tons of aflatoxin, which produces liver cancer, and clostridium, which produces gas gangrene. It had filled ballistic missile warheads and bombs with the first three of these agents. These have since been destroyed.

The document notes that the UN weapons inspectors have so far destroyed:

- 38,000 chemical weapons;
- 124,800 gallons of live chemical weapons agents;
- 48 operational missiles;
- Six missile launchers;
- 30 missile warheads adapted for chemical and biological weapons; and
- Hundreds of items of equipment used for the production of chemical weapons.

The document adds that Iraq appears determined to withhold any further information and to prevent the weapons inspectors from finding it themselves.

Netanyahu may meet Albright on peace process

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Preliminary contacts are under way among the Foreign Ministry and the governments of Spain and Italy about a possible visit by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to meet with his counterparts in Madrid and Rome on March 4 or 8.

This could facilitate a rendezvous in either of these European capitals between Netanyahu and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, in which her ongoing effort to get the peace process moving again would top the agenda.

Albright's involvement in the otherwise truncated Israeli-Palestinian dialogue reflects the current U.S. role as the exclusive sounding board for the two sides.

This was borne out in the terse reference to the peace process in Sunday's cabinet communique. "Concerning the negotiations with the Palestinians, the prime minister said he intends to try to advance the discussions of the committees negotiating on the interim agreement," it said.

A senior official indicated that "if the Americans feel that enough progress has been made in finding common ground and that therefore the meetings are warranted, they'll be held."

To that end, cabinet secretary Dan Naveh and Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser, Uzi Arad were scheduled to fly to the United States for the round of talks proposed last week by Albright at the close of her 20-hour visit.

Chief Palestinian Authority negotiator Saeb Erekat was to confer with Naveh and Arad under American auspices.

A note of pessimism was struck, however, by a government source who maintained that no headway can be anticipated until the current Iraqi crisis reaches its eventual denouement.

"I don't think the Palestinians will make a single concession," he said, "because they do not want to seem to be cooperating with the United States." He attributed this to Palestinian support of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's impending showdown with the United States and Great Britain.

Another sign of alleged Palestinian implacability was seen by this source in the Palestinian Authority's (PA) "release of 60 Hamas activists during the past two weeks, among them two men who were implicated in the Beit Lid suicide bombings in which 22 Israelis were killed."

Palestinian officials said Sunday they doubt the United States will succeed in moving the negotiations forward. On the eve of his departure for Washington, Erekat told reporters there are no plans to hold trilateral talks with U.S. administration and Israeli officials during his visit.

"We demand the United States take a more active role and honor the written agreements signed and witnessed by former U.S. secretary of state Warren Christopher," he said. Erekat said negotiating sessions were planned for this week, "but we have no plans to hold discussions with the Israelis."

Erekat blamed Netanyahu for the deadlock, saying it is the result of his refusal to implement the signed accords.

Meanwhile, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat was expected to meet with European Commission President Jacques Santer in Gaza this week and was expected to ask the European community to take a more active role in the peace process.

PA Higher Education Minister Hanan Ashrawi warned the United States must change its tactics when dealing with Israel, calling it a "permanent dilemma." Ashrawi said Palestinian demands focus on a settlement freeze and particularly in Jerusalem, as any decisions there would effect the future of the entire peace process.

Ashrawi stressed that the Palestinians will not give up on their right to their own homeland and will do everything within their power to generate support on this issue, as well as the continued confiscation of Palestinian land by Israel.

Meanwhile, PA Deputy Chairman Mahmoud Abbas last week met with Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov in Moscow and asked the Russians to take a more active role in the peace process, as well as discussing the Iraqi crisis.

EU urged to take balanced approach on peace process

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — American Jewish officials are urging the European Union (EU) to take a more balanced approach to the Middle East peace process.

In a meeting with a senior EU official organized by B'nai Brith, Jewish officials criticized what they say has been a "tilt" by the EU over the years toward the Arab side of the conflict.

Specifically, they took umbrage at a report recently released by European Commission Vice-President Manuel Marin, which demands that the 15-nation European Union take on a larger, more active role in the peace process.

The 23-page document approved by the European Commission – which serves as the EU's highest decision-making body – blames Palestinian economic misfortune exclusively on measures that have been taken by Israel, particularly the closures it imposes on the self-rule areas after each terror attack.

The European Union has been the largest donor to the Palestinian Authority, but the EU document speaks of "international donor fatigue" brought on by a lack of progress and warns that "regional cooperation and integration cannot make headway unless there is real progress toward a solution of the Arab- Israeli conflict."

Dan Mariaschin, director of B'nai Brith's Centre for Public Policy, called the report "one example of many over the years of this insensitivity to the Israeli concerns," noting that "the security concerns of Israel were given short shrift."

At last week's meeting with Javier Prats, a senior aide to Marin, Jewish officials sought to explain why the European Union will find it difficult to attain greater political clout in Middle East peacemaking.

"Some of the complaints they voice about being at the periphery of the process are self-inflicted," said Jess Hordes, Washington director of the Anti-Defamation League, who also took part in the meeting.

"If you don't have credibility with both of the parties, you're not going to be invited to the table to play the kind of role that you want to play."

Jewish officials said the meeting gave them an opportunity to convey their concerns to the European Union but conceded it did little to narrow the gap in their views.

The meeting came just weeks after B'nai Brith opened up an office in Brussels, the headquarters of the European Union.

Mariaschin said B'nai Brith intends to use that new channel to continue to make its views known about European involvement in the peace process.

Seven soldiers wounded in Hezbollah ambush

BY DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — One Givati Brigade soldier was killed and seven others were wounded in a close-range clash with Hezbollah gunmen in the western sector of the security zone in southern Lebanon, early last Saturday morning. Gun battles continued throughout the day.

According to reports Saturday night, some mortar rounds also exploded close to the northern border in Western Galilee but did not fall inside Israel and there were no casualties or serious damage.

Sgt. Nikolai Rappaport, 23, of Tel Aviv, was killed in Lebanon after being hit in the neck by shrapnel when his unit walked into what appears to have been a carefully planned Hezbollah ambush.

The IDF said it was making efforts to have Rappaport's body transported Sunday to Russia, where his mother lives. Rappaport, immigrated three years ago. His father and sister recently moved here.

The soldiers returned fire, killing at least one attacker. Two others were killed later in a search operation by Givati troops.

OC Northern Command Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine said Hezbollah gunners again broke the Grapes of Wrath understandings by firing dozens of mortars and Katyusha rockets from Yatar and Zibbikin villages north of the zone, while helping to extricate the Hezbollah squad.

IAF helicopters managed to land in the area to evacuate the wounded, despite the heavy firing, difficult terrain and bad weather. Levine praised the courage and determination of the soldiers and the efforts of the IAF in carrying out the evacuation.

Four of the wounded soldiers were brought directly to Nahariya Government Hospital. Three were suffering from light injuries caused by shrapnel and bullets and the fourth was said to be in satisfactory condition.

Hospital director Prof. Shaul Shassa said he expects all the wounded to make a full recovery and most to be released in a few days.

The first clash occurred when the Givati patrol was ambushed around 4 a.m., about 1.5 kilometres northwest of the IDF's Karkum position in the western sector of the zone.

The regional brigade commander, Lt.-Col. Nimrod, told reporters the Hezbollah gunmen had been hiding in the trees and shrubs and had opened fire first at the soldiers, who had been on their way to a nearby wadi.

Levine said explosive devices were detonated alongside the troops and almost immediately they came under light-weapons fire at very close range. According to some reports, the devices were anti-personnel Claymore mines.

Several hours later, reinforcements encountered remnants of the Hezbollah squad and killed at least two more gunmen, probably wounding several others.

Givati battalion commander Lt.-Col. Avi said the second clash also occurred at close quarters and that the Hezbollah squad had been eliminated. The gunmen left behind a large quantity of equipment, including sophisticated night sights, remote-control detonators, three M-16 rifles, and a hand grenade of IDF origin.

IDF, Palestinians clash

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Soldiers fired rubber bullets and tear gas at stone-throwing protesters last week during a pro-Iraqi demonstration held near Rachel's Tomb.

Eight to 14 Palestinians were injured, including two police officers and an Associated Press photographer, Palestinian reports said. The IDF spokesperson said there were no reported injuries.

Hundreds of demonstrators holding photographs of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and Iraqi and Palestinian flags jeered at U.S. President Bill Clinton. Some chanted "down with the USA" and "Clinton go back to your sexual affairs and forget about Iraq." Many also denounced Britain for backing the United States in the standoff with Iraq.

Palestinian police officers fanned out along the streets intending to quell the riot, but failed to prevent clashes. Some Palestinian officers reportedly argued with IDF troops as the crowds dispersed telling them that the Palestinian rioters were the Palestinians' responsibility.

Countdown to war

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Haven't we been through this before? As the seventh anniversary of the end of the Gulf War approaches, the countdown to another armed conflict in Iraq has begun yet again.

Mideast Analysis

And although the cause of the latest tension is much different than in 1991, the broader issue is remarkably similar: Iraq's stubborn refusal to abide by international norms of behavior.

Eight years ago in August, Iraq flouted the will of the world by invading neighboring Kuwait, thereby bringing upon itself an ignominious military defeat which ushered in an era of ruin for its oil-based economy and deprivation for its long-suffering people.

Last week, in an eerie reprise of past events, a new war in the Middle East loomed because Iraq refuses to cooperate fully with United Nations weapons inspectors. Their mandate is to find and destroy Iraq's remaining arsenal of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons of mass destruction and the long-range missiles that can deliver them.

With Iraq hewing to its position that UN monitoring teams will be barred from many suspected manufacturing and storage sites, the United States warned Baghdad that diplomacy was running its course and that a massive aerial bombing campaign was not far off.

Israel, hit by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles during the Gulf War, made preparations to defend its population and to strike Iraq in the event of aggression. But as of this week, Iraq had not issued any threat to bombard Israel, and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai minimized the probability of an Iraqi attack. Nevertheless, on a visit to the region to shore up support for U.S. policy, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright declared that Washington's response would be "swift and forceful" if Baghdad attacked Israel or any Arab state,

At the centre of the deepening crisis looms the figure of Saddam Hussein, Iraq's strongman, who has consistently played a cat-and-mouse game with inspection teams since the passage of the first UN resolution in April 1991 calling upon Iraq to eliminate its storehouse of non-conventional weapons.

The inspectors have indeed destroyed much of Iraq's capabilities. But, as the UN's chief weapons inspector, Richard Butler, recently observed, Iraq has equivocated and stonewalled, and still possesses enough biological materiel to "blow away Tel Aviv."

The current crisis stems from last November's unilateral action by the Iraqi government to expel U.S. nationals from the monitoring teams and the UN's subsequent decision to withdraw all its inspectors. Russia intervened, and the inspectors, including the Americans, returned.

But on Jan. 13, Iraq blocked an inspection by a team composed primarily of Americans. Then, in quick succession, Saddam threatened to oust inspectors within six months, and demanded an eventual freeze on all inspections. These proclamations prompted Butler, fresh from inconclusive talks in Baghdad, to warn that Iraq's obstructionist tactics would make it impossible to verify Iraq's compliance with UN resolutions.

If Butler's dire forecast materializes, the United States, in concert with Britain, will launch what U.S. Secretary of Defence William Cohen has described as a "significant" air assault against Iraq. The chief targets would likely be suspected weapons sites, including presidential palaces, military bases and command and control centres. But short of an accompanying ground offensive, which is not in the works, can such a barrage bring Iraq to heel? Iraq, in January and February 1991, survived 43 consecutive days of heavy bombing. And Iraq has easily absorbed four pinprick attacks since hostilities ended.

Furthermore, the political climate is not what it was after Iraq's incursion into Kuwait. Apart from Kuwait, the Arab states have not endorsed the military option, and Russia, China and France want to resolve the crisis through peaceful means. But the United States is gearing up for war.

JERUSALEM (JTA Feb. 8) – The total mobilization of Jewish manpower, funds, scientific skill and technical ability to prosecute and end the Arab war on the Jews of Palestine was demanded by David Ben-Gurion, chairman of the Jewish Agency, at a meeting of Mapai – the Palestine Labor party. He called for the fullest cooperation of all strata of society in villages and city in order to stretch to the ultimate the meager supplies available to the Jews. The agency chief said that the first round of the war had ended in failure for the Arabs, but warned that they are preparing for renewed attacks.

Weizmann uses light to destroy cancer tumors

REHOVOT – A promising cancer therapy, partially which destroys tumors by exposing them to light may be significantly improved thanks to new materials developed at the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Institute scientists reported on the new development at the Conference on Chemical Modifiers of Cancer Treatment in Clearwater, Florida, on January 28-31.

Photodynamic therapy or PDT, in which light activates cancer-killing drugs, has generated enormous interest in the medical world in recent years. However, PDT has several limitations: it is effective only against relatively flat and thin tumors like certain types of skin and bladder cancers, and patients undergoing PDT must avoid the sun for weeks following treatment because their skin becomes overly sensitive to strong light.

The new materials, derived from chlorophyll, the green pigment that allows plants to capture sunlight, may now overcome these problems. These "green" materials may make it possible to apply PDT to bulky solid tumors. Moreover, patients may need to avoid the sun for only a day or two after therapy.

The materials, developed by professors Avigdor Scherz of the Institute's plant sciences department and Yoram Salomon of the biological regulation department, were shown to kill cancer cells in tissue culture and in mice. The Dutch company Steba Beheer NV is now developing them for clinical use worldwide.

"If successful, in the future our 'green' PDT could be a powerful new tool in the struggle against cancer," says Scherz.

PDT uses drugs that become toxic only when exposed to light. First, the drug is injected into the bloodstream or the tumor. Then the tumor is exposed to light in a controlled manner. Thus the drug is activated and destroys tumor cells while having little affect on healthy tissues.

"The great advantage of this treatment over conventional chemotherapy is that the drug's action is confined to the illuminated tumor site, so that the damage to healthy tissues is minimized and side effects are significantly reduced," says Salomon.

Another advantage of the new chlorophyll derivatives is they clear out of the body much faster than existing drugs because the new materials have been modified to make them soluble in water, which in turn speeds their removal from tissues. Consequently, patients can tolerate outdoor light shortly after treatment without fearing that the photosensitive materials will harm their skin.

The solubility makes the materials easier to administer to patients.

To deliver their materials precisely to the desired site, the scientists can attach them to antibodies, or other molecules, that act as "guided missiles," transporting the "green" materials to the target in the body.

When illuminated, the new materials were found to first destroy the blood vessels that feed the tumor. Without these vessels, the tumor cannot develop or even survive. Then, the materials destroy the tumor itself.

Tumors that are close to the body surface can be exposed to direct illumination. When a bulky tumor lies deeper within the body, it can be illuminated with a fiberoptic light guide.

The materials have successfully eradicated relatively large malignant melanoma tumors in mice. In tissue culture, they have destroyed other cancer cell types, including breast and colon.

The effectiveness of the new materials in humans will soon be tested by Steba Beheer NV, which is planning to conduct clinical trials worldwide.

Scientists find deafness gene

JERUSALEM — Scientists from Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre in Jerusalem, in collaboration with the U.S. National Institute of Health and Howard Hughes Medical Institute at the University of Iowa, have identified an altered gene which may be responsible for up to 10 percent of all hereditary deafness.

These findings will help scientists understand Pendred Syndrome, the disorder caused by the altered pendrin gene, which typically produces deafness at birth due to improper development of the inner ear.

The initial studies, which eventually led to the discovery of the altered gene's location, were conducted by Hadassah's department of endocrinology and metabolism. Hadassah scientists were the first to classify the disorder as genetic by identifying a family affected by the syndrome.

After discovering chromosome 7 as the location of the defect, Hadassah partnered with the U.S. institutions to uncover the precise gene on the chromosome that carried the genetic "misspellings."

Pendred Syndrome, most prevalent among the Arab population, was later discovered at Hadassah in nearly 40 other Israelis, all Muslim or Druse.

The disorder can affect people from any ethnic group, though it is more prevalent in those of Arab descent, where marriage among cousins is common.

Prof. Benjamin Glaser, a Hadassah endocrinologist who was part of the research team, explains that there are hundreds of defective genes involved in various types of deafness. Out of 1,000 babies born with a hearing disorder, half are caused by a gene mutation.

"It isn't clear how these mutations cause deafness," said Glaser, "but at least in some of the patients, the deafness appears in early childhood and not at birth. Thus, identifying the gene is clearly a breakthrough in the effort to prevent and treat deafness in these patients."

This discovery sheds light on a disorder that has confounded scientists for more than a century. "With gene therapy down the road, it could be possible to prevent the deafness from appearing, and even take action in the fetus," said Glaser.

Artist, 72, wins prestigious Grumbacher Award

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 72-year-old artist Pearl Granville of North York, winning a major prize just confirms that it's never too late to learn.

For her haunting and mystical watercolor Ladies of the Court, she recently won the Grumbacher Award for art.

Granville didn't start to paint till she was 40, and she has to do all her work sitting down because her neck is fused following a serious car accident in her native England. She can't bend her head down because of her neck injury and has to sit facing her canvas at eye level.

Ladies of the Court was chosen through an exhibit by the Willowdale Group of Artists. When the award was given, the painting was described as "a fabulous piece of artwork consisting of realism art with abstract overtones which are enhanced by the vivacity of color."

When Granville arrived in Toronto in 1965 with her husband Jacques and their two children, Howard, 18, and Rosalind, 16, she cast around for something to keep her busy.

"When I was in England, I worked for my husband, a hairdresser, but here I had nothing to do. I became a volunteer at Baycrest Centre and one of my jobs was in the arts and crafts section. That led me to doing my own painting."

She has had to switch from oils to watercolor because her husband, a hairdressing teacher at Humber College for 16 years, and one of her greatest fans, is allergic to the strong smell of oil paint and turpentine.

The walls of the Granville's Bathurst Street apartment are lined with magnificent examples of her work. The prize-winning Ladies of the Court is based on a drawing of an Englishwoman's face she did many years ago that is still mounted on her wall.

In Ladies of the Court, that one face becomes three in a ghostly frieze with abstract overtones.

Granville encourages other women to take up a serious career, even if it happens after raising a family.

Her art lessons at Koffler Centre and two nights a week classes and summer school at Central Technical School for nearly 15 years behind her, Granville still works for hours at a time, although her output in the last few years has declined.

Play's director combines various career loves

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At various times Lisa Rothman wanted to be a teacher, a psychologist or a philosopher. Now, as a 26-year-old theatre director, she feels she has combined all these careers into one.

For instance, she is directing her first big commercial play, Sam Shepard's Fool for Love, Feb. 12 to 28 at Solar Stage, 416-368-8031.

She accepted this challenge because she thinks external and internal aspects of dramas are opposite sides of a coin and Fool for Love, one of Shepard's most popular plays, unites them both.

Lisa Rothman

It is certainly a far cry from Replika, a play without spoken dialogue,which tells the story of five survivors of Auschwitz . Rothman directed it at Summerworks Festival this year, where it garnered considerable praise from the critics.

But Rothman is in the world she loves, an attraction she said started when at the age of 18 months, she was taken to see a live performance of Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs by her parents, Anna and Allan Rothman.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fourth annual Purim Art Contest and we are looking for drawings about Purim from students in elementary school.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 12. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small or too large. Please paint, draw, or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title. Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 27, 1998. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners." The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 6, 1998.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 12, 1998. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Eye on Arts

HUNGARIAN HERITAGE SERVES SISTERS WELL

About a year ago, Montreal-area author Elaine Kalman Naves published Journey to Vaja: Reconstructing the World of A Hungarian-Jewish Family (McGill-Queen's University Press). The book, she explained, was a "creative non-fiction" account of several generations of the Weinbergers, a family living in rural Hungary who were among the nearly half a million Hungarian Jews whom the Nazis deported to death camps in 1944.

Although Naves took liberties in telling her autobiographical family saga, she did not want to present it as a novel because "I wanted the reader to trust me and to trust that I'm telling a true story." Complete with photographs, family charts and maps, Journey to Vaja was received as family history at its most vivid.

It turns out that Kalman Naves has a sister who is also a writer. Judith Kalman, who lives in Toronto, has just had her first book, The County of Birches, published.

The book offers a collection of linked stories that chronicle the journey of a fictitious family, the Weiszes, from Hungary's vineyards through the Holocaust to suburban Montreal.

Kalman's stories are underscored by loss and dislocation, but they are also infused with laughter and compassion. The County of Birches is published by Douglas & McIntyre and sells for $18.95.

Golani's concert at Beth Tikvah will feature music by Israeli composers and other Jewish composers, including Oedon Partos, Yehezkel Braun, Ernest Bloch, Joseph Joachim and Srul Irving Glick. Bernadene Blaha will accompany Golani on piano.

Tickets are $18 and are available through the synagogue office, 221-3433.

Jewish themes natural for author

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Toronto author Cary Fagan began writing the first draft of the novel that would become Sleeping Weather (Porcupine's Quill, $15.95), he had little notion that its protagonist, Leon Stone, had been in prison or that Leon's father, Mordecai, had been an habitue of the racetrack.

"I knew nothing about the racetrack," says Fagan. "When I realized this was going to be part of the story, I said, 'Why?' It came to me as a complete surprise."

Fagan's third novel tells the story of Leon, a carver of wooden carousel horses. He has a loving wife, Dean, and young daughter, Sylvie. They live in a modest house in a midtown Toronto neighborhood that, because of his agoraphobia, he rarely leaves.

Having found redemption in the love and understanding of his wife, Leon wants to help Vasily, a down-and-out immigrant drifter who has moved into the basement next door. But even as Leon befriends Vasily, he is also deeply mistrustful of him, recollecting from his own dark past what harm a man can do his neighbor.

In Sleeping Weather, Fagan presents a finely-wrought miniature world that seems as neatly enclosed as a snowy scene within a glass paperweight. The writing is spare and direct, the settings vivid, the characters finely drawn, the action spiralling logically from one scene to the next. With such subdued, realistic prose, it's clear why Fagan has been described as "a psychological realist in the best sense of the tradition."

Although the main characters in Sleeping Weather are Jewish, Fagan acknowledges it is his "least Jewish" novel. Jewish themes play a more prominent role in his two previous novels, The Animals' Waltz (1994) and The Doctor's House (1996).

"Jewish themes just come naturally out of who I am and where I come from and what I know of my family," says Fagan, 40.

"Like many writers of my age who were born here, I try to find my Jewish subject matter in an honest way. You can't write like Isaac Bashevis Singer, it's not possible. I feel my Jewishness culturally and I think I have a strong imaginative sense of Jewish community and the Jewish cultural tradition, and I think this informs my work."

Fagan's first novel, The Animals' Waltz, focuses on Sheila Hersh, a young unmarried woman whose life is divided between a bohemian existence in downtown Toronto and a more prosaic existence in the northerly suburb of Bathurst Manor, where she works in the family mattress business.

Shortly after the book was published by Lester in Canada, St. Martin's Press purchased U.S. publication rights, and it won a favorable review in the New York Times, a rare coup for a Canadian first novel.

His second novel, The Doctor's House, was actually written more than a decade before its publication by Paperplates Books, a small publishing house that Fagan runs with a partner.

Sparse and gripping, The Doctor's House transcends its small canvas and Fagan's habitual realism; it's powerful evidence of a masterful literary craftsman at work. No wonder Fagan was awarded the City of Toronto Book Award and the Jewish Book Committee Prize for Fiction.

Fagan, who leads fiction workshops for Toronto Writing Workshop (of which this reviewer is a recent alumnus), is currently putting the finishing touches on a new novel, a tale about five days in the lives of two brothers who go to New York in the late 1970s, hoping to meet Isaac Bashevis Singer.

He has also written Gogol's Coat, a picture book for children due from Tundra Books in the fall.

While he has yet to win the large readership that he so richly deserves, Fagan sees himself as part of a new

CBC Radio presents series on Israeli writers

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Eleanor Wachtel, host of the weekly show Writers & Company on CBC's Radio One, recently visited Israel, where she interviewed about a dozen leading Israeli writers for a five-part series, Writing A Nation: Israel at 50, that starts broadcasting on Feb. 15.

Wachtel says she found it "tremendously exciting" to meet with literary luminaries like Amos Oz, Batya Gur, Gadi Taub, S. Yizhar, Amos Elon and others who are highly influential within Israel, but in some cases, little known beyond its borders.

She characterized the Israeli literary scene as diverse, vibrant and energetically exploring new genres and directions, seemingly as never before.

"What people seem to agree on is that there's been a boom or renaissance in the last 10 or 15 years in Israeli literature. There's more writing, there are more books being published – that's a fact, not just an impression – and there are younger writers, a whole new generation of what are described as 'post-Zionist' writers in their 20s and 30s. And there are a lot more women writers now than 10 or 15 years ago."

Perhaps the best-known Israeli writer is Amos Oz, whose latest and somewhat autobiographical novel is Panther in the Basement. Wachtel's interview with Oz will air on April 26, the weekend of Israel's anniversary.

The series also features S. Yizhar, a literary "pioneer"whom many consider Israel's most illustrious writer; Naim Araidi, a Druze poet and teacher who explores problems of identity for Israeli Arabs; Sami Michael, a former Iraqi Jew whose novels and stories reflect the Sephardi perspective; Meir Shalev, a satirical newspaper columnist whose rich novels draw on biblical themes and Israeli mythology; and Hannah Bat-Shahar, wife of an Orthodox rabbi who writes highly acclaimed short fiction under a pseudonym.

Then there is Batya Gur, who is credited with having brought the detective genre into modern Hebrew. Her detectives probe behind the scenes of "closed societies" like kibbutzim.

"When Gur started writing mysteries 15 years ago, that genre didn't exist in Israel," Wachtel said. "She started to write them and then a whole lot of other people began to write them. It's almost as though the literature until then was very serious and there was no room for that kind of what we conventionally think of as escapist literature."

Two authors are profiled on each show; some of them reportedly offer very frank opinions about the others. "Because it's a small country, everybody seems to know each other," said Sandra Rabinowich, who edited the taped interviews to fit the show's hour-long format.

"Everybody is very opinionated ...which makes things very interesting and challenging."

Other writers in the series are Samich Al Kassim, a Palestinian poet and newspaper editor; Ruth Almog, noted for writing Israel's first feminist novel; Gaudi Taub, an acclaimed young dramatist, fiction writer, talk show host and critic; and Amos Elon, the Jerusalem-based critic who contributes to the New Yorker and the New York Times.

Writers & Company with Eleanor Wachtel, is heard Sundays at 3 p.m. in Toronto and Montreal, and at 5 p.m. in Vancouver.

Comedian uses powers of observation

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Multiple Choice Question: What do the following people have in common? A loquacious rabbi. A precocious Star Trek fan. A fault-finding drama teacher.
A) They're all Jewish.
B) They're all characters created by Cayle White for her one-woman show entitled Hymie Town.
C) All of the above.
Answer: C

A Toronto-born and New York City-bred comedic actor, White combined her love of people-watching and her powers of observation in creating Hymie Town.

A one-woman show consisting of a series of brief monologues, the performance centres on the lives of eight characters who embody as many unique idiosyncrasies as they do Jewish stereotypes.

"Jews are so fascinating. It's true... Like the cashier at Perl's [Meat Products Ltd.] – the way she interacts with the customers, the people complaining and buying things – it's entertainment," says White who performed Hymie Town at the Skylight Festival last summer.

White herself is quite a fascinating character. At the age of 18, she left for New York City where she received an honors degree in liberal arts and journalism from New York University.

She then enrolled in the Stella Adler Conservatory of Acting in New York, where she soon discovered that her talent lay in comedy rather than tragedy.

"When I came out of acting school, they basically said to me, 'You're not going to be a Shakespearean actor,' which is a tough blow to take. But I kind of knew it myself because I couldn't do it without laughing," she admits.

Today White, 25, has launched a career based on the art of making people laugh. In addition to performing Hymie Town, her stage experience includes work in the Toronto Fringe Festival's The Generation X-Files, the Alumni Theatre's Pride & Prejudice, the Greenwich Avenue Players' Museum and the drama Child's Play, for which she received the Best Featured Actress Award.

As a budding comedian, White has appeared in Yuk Yuk's Superclub presentation of Yids In The Hall and in a comedy troupe entitled Three Jews and A Shiksa. She has refined her skills as a stand-up comic on the stages of The Laugh Resort, Shake The Monkey Tree and Cabaret.

Having returned to Toronto, White's next project includes co-hosting a television program entitled Money Blues, which is scheduled to appear on TVOntario in mid-February. The series will explore financial matters that primarily apply to those under the age of 40.

It's an interesting twist of fate. Not too long ago, White starred in an hour-long MTV Home Video entitled MTV-Now What?. She played a debt-ridden teen whose credit cards had been cut to shreds.

"I went into Tower Video in New York and I saw the actual video for sale there and it was just like, 'Oh my G-d, I can't believe they're actually selling it,'" she says.

White says the video has yet to be released in Canada, but we still have an opportunity to catch her performance in a most memorable milk commercial in which she embraces a spotted milk carton.

It might not be a Shakespearean performance, but it sure is hilarious.

generation of Jewish writers.

"There's a resurgence of younger Jewish novelists who have a very different image of Judaism than Richler, Roth, Malamud and Bellow," he says. "And they're writing quieter novels, I would say, and more artful novels, without the hubris of that earlier generation.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

Voyager Quest wilderness lodge.

ROUGHING IT IN THE BUSH

At 30 years old, John Langford is an atypical Canadian in that he wishes for snow – lots and lots of snow.

"A fresh snowfall on a clear 25-below-zero day is just so exceptional," he rhapsodizes. "To snowshoe through fresh snow when you can literally hear five miles away is something you never forget. You can hear a tree falling down or a branch cracking. You can hear a person at the other end of the lake. It's remarkable how far you can hear, with the deadness."

Langford is director of Voyageur Quest, a Toronto-based wilderness adventure tour company that offers several winter tour packages combining rugged backwoods activities with the relative comforts of a heated cabin and hearty cooking.

Twice a week throughout the winter, Voyageur Quest transports groups of six to 10 participants from the York Mills subway station in Toronto to the edge of Algonquin Park for Footsteps of the Pioneers, a popular three-day winter package of cross-country skiing, snowshoeing and dog-sledding in equal measure.

While some Canadian snowbirds fly south to escape the white stuff, plenty of city folks are eager to see evidence of genuine snowbirds in the frozen wild. To those in the know, tracks in the snow tell tantalizing tales.

"It's all right in front of you," Langford says. "You can see the kill site of a bird of prey – wing marks in the snow and some bones. The whole story unfolds as you look at the tracks."

As for large wildlife, participants occasionally see moose or fox, and sometimes hear wolves howling at night – a sound that "always gets everyone up and out of the cabin," Langford says. "It's very dramatic."

While skiing or snowshoeing across the rugged terrain of the Canadian Shield, groups may stop to do some ice-fishing or build the traditional shelter known as a quinze (pronounced "quin-see").

Essentially a large snow cave, the quinze offers the relative comfort of a candlelit interior of about zero degrees – hardly toasty, but still preferable to an external temperature that might be 20 degrees below.

For most participants, the highlight of Footsteps of the Pioneers is the dog-sledding or "mushing," during which each takes control of a team of three or four energetic huskies. "The first half hour is absolutely exhilarating because the dogs love to run," Langford says. "When you put the harness on them, they're hard to restrain because they just can't wait to get going."

Despite the cold, many find exhilaration – and poetry – in a wintry landscape. "The change of seasons can be spectacular," Langford says. "When I think about March, when the sun rises over a partly melted lake... it's just unforgettable." And occasionally the aurora borealis dances across the night sky.

The cost of Footsteps of the Pioneers is $395 midweek and $450 on weekends, inclusive of transportation from Toronto, accommodation and meals. Participants should be in reasonably fit condition. For further information, contact Voyageur Quest, 416-486-3605 or 800-794-9660.

Call of the Wild, a wilderness adventure tour company based in Markham, Ont., also offers various winter programs. Phone 905-471-WILD or 800-776-WILD, or e-mail [adventure@cal-wild.com].

Likewise, the Haliburton Forest and Wildlife Reserve offers cross-country skiing, snowshoe and dog-sledding programs. Phone 705-754-2198.

Rothman combines different loves

"I created some kind of scene at the play; so I guess it had its effect," she said.

She became hooked for good after further exposure to theatre as a 7-year-old performer at Bayview Glen summer camp in a scene from Bye Bye Birdie; as a student at Northern Vocational School, where she directed Fool for Love at the age of 17; and as a graduate in drama at York University. The late Judy Silver at Young People's Theatre told her to go into theatre, period.

Other projects include directing Seascape with Sharks and Dancer by Don Nigro at the Village Playhouse and Oddly Alive by Marni Norwich at Toronto Fringe 1992.

A member of Theatre Fugue, she has taken part in a two-week workshop in Cuba with Teatro Escambray and in workshops with Primus Theatre of Winnipeg and the Montreal Mime School.

CHAT Tigers play entertaining brand of hockey

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tired of boring hockey and neutral zone traffic jams? Well then, forget about the NHL, the ol' clutch and grab and left wing lock lunacy.

If you want to see exciting hockey played end to end with lots of scoring chances and plenty of hits, go see the CHAT Tigers play.

They may not have the skill and experience of the pros, but they more than make up for it with enthusiasm and heart, as was made clear in a recent game in the Toronto District College Athletic Association (TDCAA).

Playing St. Mary, another private school in the nine-team league, CHAT led 4-1 early in the third period when the roof appeared to cave in.

CHAT allowed back to back goals to narrow the score to 4-3. Then, with the game in doubt, and the momentum shifting, CHAT goalie Jeff Grad made a glove save of Patrick Roy-proportions to stymie a St. Mary forward on a breakaway.

Buoyed by that effort, CHAT kept coming at their opponents, who were undermanned with only a couple of subs on their bench. CHAT got some breathing space with a fifth goal and then added another as St. Mary players started taking more chances.

Much of the third period was rough and rugged, with players from both sides running each other. At one point, one CHATnik came off the ice complaining of racial insults after an altercation in front of the CHAT net. The game got chippier and at one point it appeared the players were more intent on throwing a check than protecting a lead or scoring a goal. When all was said and done, the Tigers left the ice with an 8-3 victory.

The win improved their season record to 3-6, placing them in the middle of the pack among TDCAA schools, still with a chance to make the playoffs.

With nine games left in the regular season and with upcoming games against teams the Tigers believe they can beat, making the playoffs in their inaugural season is a realistic goal, said Rob Fishbaum, staff advisor to the team.

Last year at this time, CHAT hockey enthusiasts could only sit on the sidelines and watch as other small private schools competed in the TDCAA. Although CHAT had other teams competing in softball, basketball and track, hockey was not on the school's athletic agenda.

A member of the CHAT Tigers squares for a face-off. With a 3-6 record so far, the Tigers have a shot at making the play-offs.

But the desire to ice a team had been percolating among students for some time and last year, a couple of kids in Grade 10 got the principal's okay to get the ball rolling. With help from parents and with other kids in all grades supporting the project, CHAT was able to ice a team for the first time in November. They compete against schools like Upper Canada College (the school's "B" team), St. Mike's (also their "B" team), St. Mary, Senator O'Connor, Brebeuf College and John Paul II at a calibre designated "senior B."

As one of the smaller schools, CHAT didn't have the manpower to field both junior and senior teams so the school's one squad consists of players ranging from Grade 9 to Grade 12, Fishbaum explained.

That makes them young by league standards but nevertheless, most of their games have been close, thanks in large part to the outstanding backstopping they've been getting from Grad, a AAA goalie with Don Mills.

Fishbaum said the other teams have been in the league for many years and know what to expect in league play. He said he expects CHAT to improve from year to year. The youngsters on this year's team will take over leadership roles from this year's crop of grads and there appears to be a "feeder system" already in place to continually bring new players to the Tigers, he said, referring to a four team day school league that has been playing for a couple of years.

CHAT's roster includes: Jason Wang, David Grad, Kobi Bessin, Jared Rochwerg, Andrew Goldstein, Josh Orzech, Ryan Yermus, David Goldbach, Jeff Grad, Michael Tweyman, Daniel Weinerman, David Abromovici, Jason Putterman, Ian Klaiman, Steve Glowinsky, Lee Lenkinski, Kevin Grad, Jordan Waltman, Evan Marcus and Marc Klerer.

Soviet connection leads Israel at Olympic Games

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Call it the Soviet connection.

All three athletes representing Israel at the 1998 Winter Olympics in Nagano, Japan have roots in the former Soviet Union – and two were actually born there.

The ice dancing duo of Galit Chayat, 23, and Sergei Sakanovsky, 22, will join Misha Shmerkin, who participated in the 1994 games in Lillehammer, Norway.

Chayat, born to a Russian family in the Israeli town of Kfar Saba, moved to the United States with her family when she was six years old. Sakanovsky, born in Russia, made aliyah three years ago and then moved to Delaware to train with Chayat.

Shmerkin, who was born in Odessa, Ukraine, will participate in men's skating. He will perform to chassidic and Israeli music in his short program and to central European Jewish music for his free skate.

The Inside Back

'Indiana' Jacobovici and the lost tribe of Israel

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

I'm not easily given to overstatement, but Simcha Jacobovici is a bona fide national Jewish treasure. His award-winning documentaries knead the brain, sometimes gently, sometimes not. Among the dozens of laurels in his downtown Toronto office are two Emmys for investigative journalism, won in 1995 for The Plague Monkeys, about ebola virus outbreaks in the United States; and in the following year for The Selling of Innocents, about child sex slavery in India.

But it's his work on Jewish themes that has really hit home, for me anyway. Expulsion and Memory (1996) beautifully explores the survival of Jewish traditions among descendants of Spanish crypto-Jews; while anyone whose pulse doesn't quicken from Deadly Currents (1991), about the Arab-Israeli conflict, should consult a mortician.

His Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies and the American Dream opened in Toronto last Friday and will air nationally on CBC television March 8 at 8 p.m.

Jacobovici's next project, Quest for the Lost Tribes, may well outdo them all. Over the summer, he and his crew spent several weeks in eastern India. Like Indiana Jones, minus the swagger, the filmmaker "discovered" 1.5 million hill people living on the border between Burma and the Indian provinces of Manipur and Mizoram, who had an amazing story to tell.

These people collectively call themselves the Children of Menmasseh, likely a corruption of the word Menashe, one of the 10 lost tribes of biblical Israel. Their oral history, songs and traditions are clearly derived from the Hebrew Bible, and according to Jacobovici, at least half of them really do believe they are members of a fabled lost biblical tribe.

While the Menmasseh have strong affinities with Judaism, they are practising Christians – a fulfillment, they believe, of a prophecy that one day, a white man would expose them to their "true" faith. (Protestant missionaries arrived in 1894.)

However, about 3,000 Menmasseh call themselves B'nai Menashe and live Orthodox Jewish lives in Mizoram, a peaceful, semi-autonomous place where Jews are widely accepted; and in Manipur, a state under siege, home to 17 insurgency movements,where two synagogues were torched in a recent pogrom. The Jews here fear for their lives. Those on the repressive Burmese side of the frontier are allowed free access to synagogues inside India.

These Jews wear kippot and tzitzit, and keep kosher as best they can. They also long to go to Israel (and are willing to formally convert there), and it's here that Jacobovici isn't shy about supplementing his journalistic objectivity with a bit of advocacy. Recently, he penned a column in the Globe and Mail detailing the B'nai Menashe's desperate and unproductive pleas for help from Israel. He calls the article "a shot across Israel's bow."

It seems Jerusalem is turning a deaf ear. Several government departments, and even the Sephardi chief rabbi, have promised action, and have done nothing. Last Tuesday, 45 B'nai Menashe arrived in Israel to join the 268 already there. All have had to come under the private sponsorship of Orthodox Rabbi Eliyahu Avichail of Jerusalem. Of little help are hysterical Israeli media accounts of an impending deluge of "Indians."

"I have no desire to pick a fight with Israel," Jacobovici sighs. "To be fair, Israel's plate is full. But these people are in crisis. I see their history as my history. I'm in awe of the fact that our people survived in far-flung places-when they had no tools for survival. I want to shout Hallelujah!"

Does he believe the B'nai Menashe are a lost tribe? "I don't know. Either way, we have to respond."

Thus, on Feb. 12 at the Riverdale JCC (179A Danforth Ave.), the founding meeting is scheduled for the Canadian Friends of the B'nai Menashe, who plan to supply the community with religious articles.

The film is slated for release in the spring. Here's hoping it will make a difference.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am 84 years old, and I have never felt so alone in all my life. My husband died five years ago, but following his death, I still had my children and grandchildren around. Now that they have left the province, I don't have anybody. My daughter asked me to move to Toronto and live with her, but I'm afraid. I have lived all my life here and the thought of moving to a new city is frightening.

In the meantime, I spend all my days in my apartment watching TV or sleeping. I only go out to go to the doctors'. I just don't know what to do.

Lonely Bubbie

Dear Bubbie,

Have you spoken to your children about this? Perhaps if you discuss your feelings with them, they will be able to ease some of your fears about being alone and the possibility of moving. Whether or not you decide to move, it would be a good idea for you to participate in different social activities to help break your isolation and loneliness. Your YM-YWHA or Golden Age Association offers many groups and activities that may be of interest to you.

If you find that you are sleeping excessively, you should discuss this with your doctor as there could be many reasons for this.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Israel's Jubilee 50

"And your children will return to their own frontiers." Jeremiah 31:17

Before our very eyes these past 50 years, we have seen the wondrous unfolding of Jeremiah's promise, one of this century's most profound, even miraculous, human stories...after 2,000 years, children returning to their own frontiers, to their own homes, to their own land, the State of Israel.

The Canadian Jewish news

About this jubilee supplement

This special supplement is a tribute to Israel's 50th anniversary. It attempts to provide the reader with a wide array of archival material, as well as insights, ideas and reflections from a varied group of experts and thinkers about the State of Israel at the juncture of its 50th year of existence.

Irwin Cotler writes about Israel from the perspective of his lifelong dedication to the struggle on behalf of the advancement of human rights.

Shira Herzog shares her thoughts from the vantage of one who was born in the newly established State of Israel.

There are a number of other essays, including the seminal research by Eddy Kaplansky, formerly of Montreal, identifying all the Canadians who served in Israel's War of Independence.

A young boy with old eyes

The youngster in the adjacent photo by Nahum Gidal can't be more than 12 years old. We do not know his name, his age, where he was born, who his parents are, or indeed, whether at the time the photo was taken, he even had parents.

The number on his left forearm tells us more than our own minds can comprehend.

He is just a young boy, but his eyes are old. They could be blue or perhaps even green. But undoubtedly, they still see very vividly the searing images of an inexpressible past.

The year is 1945. He has just arrived in Palestine, a survivor of Bergen-Belsen. He is in Atlit.

And he is not alone.

Thousands upon thousands of children arrived during that same period of time and like the unnamed boy in the Gidal photo, they also built new lives for themselves in a new, unfamiliar land. Three years later, that land would be the nascent State of Israel.

Ever since, and continuing to this very moment, children have been arriving at Israel's shores, mostly now all with their families, thank God, building new lives for themselves in the ancestral homeland of promise and hope.

The cover of The CJN's special tribute supplement celebrates this, perhaps the most touching, aspect of Israel's tumultuous first 50 years. Gathering into its midst, even before the first day of its official existence, the remainder of an unwanted people, Israel arose, tested by relentless adversity, resilient, strong, compassionate.

But the ingathering of exiles is only one of the eternal promises that it is Israel's destiny to fulfil. Among the others, as eloquently read to the world some 50 years ago by David Ben-Gurion in the Declaration of Independence, is the building of a country that "rest[s] upon foundations of liberty, justice and peace as envisioned by the Prophets of Israel."

In the life of nations, 50 years is nearer to the beginning. Institutions of civic and public life are still maturing, finding their efficiencies, testing strengths and correcting weaknesses, ignoring evanescing patterns but evolving according to the traditions of daily life.

The same is true of Israel.

The public institutions of Israel are still in a stage of development and growth. This is evident from the frequent ugly clash and clamor of public debate on any number of important and even trivial issues; from the disheartening internal divisions that cry out for healing; and from the seemingly country-wide, intense engagement in all matters political.

But if Israel's institutions of civic and public life are still maturing, it is as a result of unparalleled daring and courage that these institutions exist at all. Israel's rebirth 50 years ago is one of history's great affirmations of the indomitability of the human spirit.

That spirit, bothered and burdened by its own imperfections, is manifest in Israel each day. Can anyone recall a country today, or ever before, which, after merely its first 50 years has achieved as much while having to endure so much? In the course of five decades, Israel has been at war five times. And it is in a state of perpetual military preparedness. Indeed, as these words are being written, the country is on alert to protect against the possibility of harm from Iraq.

However, many are the people today, among whom are large numbers of Jews born after the Six Day War, the Yom Kippur War and the intifadah, for whom the State of Israel is but the constant centre of yet another political storm on CNN.

More has been forgotten about Israel's accomplishments in the first 50 years of its revived national life than has actually been achieved by the vast majority of the countries that sit in the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Worst of all, however, is that in some quarters, even the justice of Israel's cause has been forgotten, steered into a dark corner of history by almost three decades of passive ignorance or active distortion.

But the Jews have returned to Israel. This is the inescapable, irreversible fact of history in 1998: Jews have returned to where they once were; Jews have returned to rebuild and to restore what had long ago been confiscated, destroyed, parched, scorched and devastated.

In a certain metaphorical sense, Israel is very much like the unnamed boy in the Gidal photograph, namely young, but with very old eyes.

The future beckons, though it is uncertain.

We are still nearer to the beginning. An entire world of opportunity and possibility is ahead of us. We need not strain to look too far into the future, for we see with the experience, the humility and the wisdom of "old eyes," eyes that can glance back millennia, that have seen one people, united, standing at the foot of a small desert mountain, that have seen exile and dispersion, that have seen horrible suffering, that have seen rebirth and revival, that have seen exaltation and euphoria.

As we reflect on Israel's 50th anniversary, let us therefore say: Blessed is God for having brought us to this great and glorious day, though we are still only at the beginning.

Israel's Jubilee 50

Israel still facing tough, existential issues

By IRWIN COTLER

In a recent exchange on one of Israel's more popular television shows, a panelist opined that in this 50th year of the Jewish State, "more Jews hate other Jews than at any time in Jewish history." Recognizing the extravagance of this statement in historical terms, he quickly corrected himself: "Well, at least in the 50 years since the creation of the State."

The statement went unchallenged – vindicated, it seemed, by the inability of the government even to launch the 50th anniversary celebrations in tandem with Diaspora communities and world leaders on the first night of Chanukah.

Indeed, a daily canvass of popular culture in Israel – Israeli newspapers, radio, television, literature, theatre, art, public forums and the like – suggests that Israel has become a Balkanized adversarial culture or worse – a modern day leviathan involving "a war of all against all."

"Israel circa 1997 looks horrible and ugly," writes Israeli social critic Iris Mizrachi, after a visit to Ofakim, Israel's southern "unemployment capital."

"Israel is an Ugly Duckling," intones Gideon Samet in Ha'aretz, reflecting on Israel among the nations.

"All hope is lost – avda tikvateinu," write political columnists Amnon Dankner and Ron Mayberg in a metaphorical allusion to Israel's national anthem Hatikvah (hope), on the eve of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting with President Bill Clinton.

"J'accuse" – the finger-pointing legacy of the Rabin assassination – continues to underpin Israeli discourse and debate.

And Knesset member Shlomo Ben Ami, in a devastating critique of Israel at 50, characterizes it as "a society without an axis…like a game of pick-up sticks scattered all over the place…Actually, there no longer is an Israeli society…[only] separate civil blocks that are hostile to each other."

Admittedly, Israeli laments about the matzav, the situation, are nothing new, and are even something of a national pastime. Nor, arguably, is Israel beset by the sense of gloom that prevailed on the eve of the Six Day War (when the most popular quip was "Would the last person to leave Lod Airport please turn out the lights"), or the pain in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, or the anguish amidst the gas masks and sealed rooms of the scud missile attacks in the Gulf War.

But while the "objective" situation is clearly better, the subjective sense of groundless hatred – of sinat chinam – has never seemed greater. In fact, what seems to distinguish the present situation from any other, or at least any other in the past 50 years, is a sense that the felt hatred is indeed well-grounded, so that any rebukes about the danger of groundless hatred – or appeals for "unity" – are themselves dismissed as a "political whitewash," or as just "political."

Moreover, the present sense of anger and grievance, of "hatred with a cause," is anchored in, if not inspired by, six converging existential dilemmas or divides – a series almost of existential referendums besetting Israel and the Jewish People.

The first is a referendum on the peace process, or perhaps more accurately, the war/peace existential divide, where each side of the right/left political divide appears to equate the policy of "the other" as an invitation to "apocalypse now."

Indeed, for some time now, particularly in the last 20 years, we have increasingly been witness to the divisive and recriminatory politics of exclusion. And so it is then, in a symbolic and metaphysical underpinning to their politics, the rightist bloc (most of Likud, the Land of Israel movement, the national religious parties) hold themselves out as the "National Camp" (Machane Haieumi), allowing the inference to be drawn, if not drawing it themselves, that those who are not part of the "National Camp" are not really Zionist or authentically Jewish; conversely, those who comprise the leftist bloc (the Labor and Meretz parties, many of the country's leading businesspeople, intellectuals, journalists and artists) hold themselves out as the "Peace Camp" (Machane Hashalom), allowing the inference to be drawn, if not drawing it themselves, that those who are not part of the "Peace Camp" are somehow "anti-peace" if not "obstacles to peace."

Israel's Jubilee 50

One side's dream is other side's nightmare

What is at stake here – and what is being argued – is not just foreign policy option A or B. What is being debated is a scenario where one side's dream is the other side's worst nightmare, an existential "politics of exclusion" that can quickly descend – and does descend – into a politics and rhetoric of hate.

The second major referendum or existential divide is the increasing kulturkampf, culture wars, between the religious and secular in general; and in the sub-text, "denominational wars" amongst the religious denominations themselves.

Indeed, the "zero-sum" character of the polemics – and politics – is not only to be found, or even to be found, in the denominational wars surrounding the proposed conversion law, with the Orthodox bloc threatening to bring down the government if it does not enact the law, and the Reform and Conservative movements and their supporters threatening to bring down the government if it does; or even in the ongoing cultural wars between the religious and secular, for which the opening of Bar Ilan Street on Shabbat has become metaphor and message of this conflict.

Rather, it is to be found in the demonizing language used by each side to characterize the other, with both appropriating "Nazi" epithets and caricatures as their weapon of hate. And so it is, then, that in the last two weeks alone, secular commentators and critics have engaged in polemical diatribes against haredi Jews that could have been taken out of Der Sturmer; similarly, ultra-Orthodox leaders unleashed a campaign of vilification of the secular that was tantamount to reading them out of the Jewish people.

The third existential divide, one not unrelated to the former but going far beyond it, is the definition and character of Israel as a "Jewish and democratic state," a normative referent now constitutionalized in Israel's Basic Laws on human rights. For some, it suffices that the state be "Jewish," which in its best interpretation means that if the state is Jewish it will necessarily be democratic, but which often means that if it is Yitzhak Shamir at the Madrid peace conference in 1991.

"Jewish" it is immaterial whether it is democratic – or worse: that there is an inherent contradiction between Jewish and democratic. Conversely, for others it suffices that the state be "democratic," which again, in the best interpretation, means that if it is democratic it will necessarily be Jewish, since the meaning of democratic and Jewish is taken to be one and the same; often, however, what is meant is that if the state is democratic it is immaterial whether it is Jewish – or worse: that a state that is democratic cannot therefore be "Jewish." Indeed, the emerging debate surrounding the notion of a Jewish and democratic state now includes the relationship of Israel to its non-Jewish minority. In a word, can Israel be a "Jewish" state and also be a state for all its citizens, including its non-Jewish Arab minority?

The fourth existential divide is a socio-economic one, which was dramatized in the perennial budget debate. For while "tribal politics" dominated debate once again – with the only difference being that there were more tribes seeking more payoffs – the underlying chasms of rich and poor, and the burgeoning inequality between them, exploded in a cacophony of hate. Indeed, the attempt to graft a Thatcherite free market economic policy on a communitarian welfare state – with all the attending economic and social dislocation – triggered an unprecedented explosion of anger and protest.

The fifth existential divide is the increasingly tribal character of Israeli society and culture (There are now 10 discernible tribes in Israeli society, as I have written elsewhere, and not organized

What Did you Do Last Summer? I Went to ISRAEL!!

A BANNER YEAR!

In 1997, over 1200 Canadian youth participated in short term Israel Experience Programs.

I have had a wonderful time on this tour. I have learned so much about Israeli culture as well as about my personal sense of Judaism. Israel has evoked in me a sense of spirituality and a feeling of closeness to the Jewish people."

Wendy Breuer

Coming to Israel for the first time was the perfect experience for me at this point in my life. Programs like these are very important for young people."

Aaron Cappel

From walking in the streets of Metropolitan Tel-Aviv to conversing with an Orthodox man on the streets of Tzfat, I experienced the religious differences in the country. Through this I explored the meaning of religion to me."

Simona Tchaplia

I cannot think of a better forum in which to first experience the glory of Israel."

Craig Mazin

This trip to Israel has been the most amazing experience of my life... Having grown up in a city with a very small Jewish community, I was very confused about my views regarding Judaism and its role in my life. This tour has not only made me appreciate Israel's beauty, but it also helped to give new meaning to my life as a Jew."

Kate Singer

It has provided me with an opportunity to learn a great deal about my culture, my history and the current situation in Israel. It also led me to ask myself a lot of questions about who I am, and what I believe in. Finally, this trip has allowed me to meet new people and develop great friendships."

Janice Tepper

I have gained so much from my time in Eretz Israel and it has truly had a profound effect on my life. This trip has given me the opportunity to see through my own eyes much of what I have learned and heard about throughout my life."

Evan Pilz

This trip was a wonderful experience that has helped me understand my Jewish roots and has strengthened my bond with Israel."

SPECIAL GIFT MADE TO ISRAEL EXPERIENCE TO HONOUR CHARLES R. BRONFMAN'S 65TH BIRTHDAY

In honour of their father's 65th birthday, Stephen Bronfman and Ellen Bronfman Hauptman and Andrew Hauptman made a generous donation to the United Israel Appeal of Canada to subsidize Canadian youth on four 1997 Israel Experience programs. "It was important for Ellen, Andrew and I to do something for our dad that would really make him feel great; sending kids to Israel does exactly that", said Stephen.

The funds donated by Stephen, Ellen and Andrew were used to dramatically reduce the cost of four post high school Israel experience programs and enable 65 students who needed financial assistance to receive additional subsidy. With additional funding from the Jewish Agency for Israel and CJA/UJA Federations in Montreal and Toronto, eighty students on waiting lists were accommodated as well. All in all, over 200 Canadian Jewish youth benefitted from the initiative.

"We wanted those youth who would not have the opportunity to experience Israel to do so without worrying about the cost" Stephen added.

The success of this gift has led to an exciting partnership for the summer of 1998. Local CJA/UJA Federations have allocated special funds for Israel Experience Subsidies that will be matched by UIA Canada and the CRB Foundation, amounting to over 1.5 million dollars over the next three years. Due to the foresight and generosity of the Bronfman family and the CRB Foundation the summer of 1998 promises to be an exciting one for Israel Experience.

ROGER NEILSON'S HOCKEY CAMP IN ISRAEL

St. Louis Blues' associate coach Roger Neilson and Florida Panther's star Bill Lindsay led a Hockey camp at Canada Centre in Metullah, Israel this past August. Fifteen Canadians and thirty-five Israeli teens spent two weeks training with the Israeli Junior National Team, received expert instruction from Roger Neilson and his staff and toured the Northern part Israel as well as spending Shabbat in Jerusalem.

Participants were able to combine the beauty of an Israel Experience with their enjoyment of hockey.

Due to the overwhelming success of the program, Roger Neilson's Hockey Camp in Israel will be held again in the summer of '98.

YOM CANADA

The largest gathering of Canadian Israel Experience participants took place on Monday, July 21 at Nitzanim Beach near Ashkelon.Over five hundred participants gathered together to compete in the First Canada Day Maccabia Games, attend a barbeque, listen to music from a new Russian immigrant troupe and a current Israeli rock star and meet other teenagers and young adults from across Canada.

Andrea & Charles R. Bronfman attended the event and were presented with a book containing the thoughts and remarks of Canadian participants on Israel Experience programs.

Many of the participants were able to be a part of this due to the Bronfman family's generous support of the Israel Experience.

In his address, Mr. Bronfman emphasized the importance of the Israel Experience in shaping the future of young Jewish people and the importance that Israel will play in all of their lives. It makes our hearts beat a little faster, and gets the adrenaline flowing," said Bronfman after meeting many of the students, adding. It gives you the feeling that what you are doing is working."

KEFIADA

Canadian Students Bring English to Summer Camps

Last summer ninety-seven Canadian students participated in Kefiada, a program where they teach Israeli children in English day camps located throughout the country. The participants worked very hard at developing "creative" and "innovative" programs to teach the Israeli children English.

The Canadians enjoyed home hospitality while in Israel living with and interacting with Israeli families. The participants were placed in communities from Eilat in the south and the Galilee Panhandle in the North.

"I've probably learned more Hebrew this summer than in 16 years of Hebrew School." says Emma Sevitt of Toronto.

Kathryn Ages of Ottawa states, "Kefiada is a great opportunity for the kids not just to learn English, but also to learn about people from abroad, about another culture, things they might not be exposed to otherwise."

CANADA ISRAEL EXPERIENCE CENTRE

The Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) is the organization born of the collective vision to strengthen Jewish identity among our Jewish youth through participation in a meaningful Israel Experience program. The founding partners of the Canada Israel Experience Centre are the Charles R. Bronfman Foundation, CZF and the Youth & Hechalutz Department of the Jewish Agency for Israel, The Council of Jewish Federations of Canada and United Israel Appeal of Canada. The CIEC acts as the Canadian arm of the New York based Israel Experience Inc.

The CIEC is responsible for marketing Israel Experience Programs throughout Canada with a goal of significantly increasing the numbers of individuals who take part in Israel Experience Programs.

In addition, the CIEC purveys National programs for unaffiliated youth as well as assists interested organizations to develop tailor made programs for their constituents. The main objective of all programs is to provide Jewish youth with a connection to Israel and to enhance their overall positive Jewish identity.

around a biblical or federal character), whose tribalism only accentuates and amplifies the war/peace, religious/secular, Jewish/democratic, and rich/poor existential divides. Indeed, the tribal character of Israeli society – which challenges the founding communitarian ethos – is itself underpinned by the narcissistic refrain of the "Me Generation."

The sixth divide is the Israel/-Diaspora one, some of whose divisions tend to mirror Israeli ones, but without the existential character or consequence for the Diaspora, either as a shared community of fate or with the felt sense of communal pain. In a word, Diaspora Jews may properly debate Israeli policy, but they do not pay the everyday price of being an Israeli, or the price of a failed Israeli policy; while the fallout of the relentless politics of recrimination and hate has Diaspora Jewry regarding Israel as just another Jewish organization.

And more: if this wrenching internal debate with its existential divides and hateful speech were not enough, the global indictment from without – sometimes feeding off these very divides – continues its steady drumbeat.

And so it is then, that on the eve of Israel's 50th anniversary, a state founded as a metaphor for human rights is increasingly characterized as a human rights violator; a state which in 1948 saw itself and was seen by others as am rodef shalom, a people in pursuit of peace, is now characterized as an obstacle to peace, if not the obstacle to peace; a state whose birthright was anchored in the United Nations is now singled out by this very United Nations for differential and discriminatory indictment. Case study: Some 30 percent of all the indictments of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights for the last 20 years have been registered against Israel – while the major human rights violators have received exculpatory immunity.

The result is that there are an increasing number of Jews today who see human rights not as aid but as adversary; who increasingly speak of the United Nations in terms of "Um Schmoom;" who regard those who speak of human rights as naive people who do not understand that there are things in Jewish history that are too terrible to be believed, but not too terrible to have happened.

But I want to suggest that we ignore human rights at our peril and the peril of our case and our cause. For a Jewish commitment to human rights is a statement not only of what we must do, but of who we are; and the belief in the justice of one's cause is a people's strongest strategic asset.

Indeed, what concerns me as I go about the Diaspora and Israel is what I perceive as a growing ambivalence, a moral confusion, a sense of moral ambiguity about Israel's case and cause.

In the Diaspora, North American Jews are increasingly distancing themselves from Israel, and increasingly involving themselves with "humanity" – or with their local community – rather than with Israel. In Israel, the society is increasingly polarized between those on the one hand, who believe that Jews can only trust in themselves and work for themselves, that "human rights" is the enemy and only Jewish rights are important, that, in a word, nothing is wrong except that "they hate us;" and those on the other hand, who speak only in terms of human rights and then in terms of Palestinian rights, who believe that the Jew is the "oppressor" and the Palestinian the "victim," that, in a word, everything is wrong, including what our enemies say about us.

What, then, can we say to all this? More importantly, what can we do? May I – on the eve of Israel's 50th anniversary, and on the eve also of the 50th anniversaries of both the Genocide Convention and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights – seek to summarize the existential lessons of Jewish history and human history. For as Aldous Huxley put it, "Life must be lived forward, but can only be understood backwards." Or as the Baal Shem Tov put it, "Forgetfulness is exile; remembrance is redemption."

Herewith some lessons/perspectives:

• Israel is not simply a snapshot at age 50 or a fragment frozen in time. It is not a CNN clip or what passes for virtual reality in the Internet of the day. Nor is it anchored only in 50 years of Israeli statehood or 100 years of Zionism. For Israel is the drama and development of civilization itself, because the Jewish people – as an Abrahamic people – are the first nation of civilization.

In a word, the Jewish people are the prototypical aboriginal people, just as the Jewish religion is the prototypical aboriginal religion, the first of the Abrahamic religions. As Abba Eban put it, "Jews are the only people who speak the same language, inhabit the same land, and worship the same G-d as they did 4,000 years ago."

It is time that we took seriously and responsibly this membership in an aboriginal people – a covenantal community – whose ancestors stood together at Sinai and whose birth certificate originates in our inception as a first nation and not simply in the ratification by the United Nations and the international community. Indeed, how else can one account for the existential determination of a post-genocidal people to return – and reconstitute itself – in Eretz Yisrael/Palestine?

• Israel then is the homeland, the aboriginal homeland, of the Jewish people, across space and time. It is not just a homeland for the Jewish people, a place of refuge and asylum, though that is certainly the case. It is the homeland of the Jewish people, wherever and whenever they may be; and that people should not only return to roots, but learn them – explore the "Jewish bookshelf,"

State is successor to biblical kingdoms

learn the aboriginal language, Hebrew, respect the plural identities.

• The State of Israel as a political/juridical entity overlaps with the "aboriginal Jewish homeland" and is, in international legal terms, a successor state to the biblical Jewish kingdoms. But that homeland is also claimed by another people – the Palestinian Arab people – that sees it as its place and patrimony.

The existence of a parallel claim does not vitiate that of the Jewish people or cause it to resonate any less as memory and memoir of homeland – where homeland represents history, roots, religion, culture, language, literature, custom, family, myth and "values" – but the equities of claim mandate the logic of partition.

• The existential divides of Israel at 50 cannot mask the existential raison d'être and moral imperative of Israel itself. In a word, Nazism almost succeeded, not only because of its pathology of hate and industry of death, but because of the powerlessness of the Jew, because of the vulnerability of the powerless. Israel, then, is an antidote to Jewish powerlessness, the raison d'être in the most profound existential sense, for Jewish self-determination. In the words of Prof. Uriel Simon, an Israeli dove – and it's a tragic comment about this truism of Jewish history – "Jewish morality has only been respected when it has had an army behind it."

• This is not to say that Israel should be above the law or that Israel should not be accountable for any violations of human rights law. On the contrary, Israel, like any other state, is responsible for any violations of international law, and the Jewish people are not entitled to any privilege or preference because of the Holocaust or the sufferings of Jewish history.

The problem, I would suggest, is not that Israel seeks, or that any of us should seek on Israel's behalf, that it be above the law, but that Israel has been systematically denied equality before the law in the international arena; not that Israel should respect human rights – which she must – but that the human rights of Israel are also deserving of respect; not that human rights standards should be applied to Israel – which they must be – but that they must be applied equally to everyone else. It is our responsibility, then, to seek equality before the law, international due process, for Israel or any other state, in the international arena.

• Again, Nazism almost succeeded not only because of the ideology of hate and the technology of terror, but because of the crime of indifference, the conspiracy of silence. Indeed we have witnessed an appalling indifference in our day to the unthinkable – ethnic cleansing; to the unspeakable – genocide; and worst of all, to the preventable genocide in Rwanda.

It is our responsibility, then, to break the walls of indifference, to shatter the silence wherever it may be. As Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel put it, neutrality always means coming down on the side of the victimizer, never on the side of the victim, coming down on the side of the torturer, never on the side of the tortured. And so it is our responsibility always to stand with the victim, even if, as Wiesel put it, we both lose, lest the victim stand alone and abandoned. Let there be no mistake about it: to avert one's eyes from evil, to be indifferent, is to be an accomplice to evil. For indifference begets acquiescence and acquiescence becomes complicity.

All of this comes together in Hillel's dictum, whose banality of repetition should not belie its profundity: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me?" If we do not affirm the essential Jewishness and justice of our case and cause – the significance of remembrance, the integrity of our values, the prophetic vision of social justice and Israel among the nations – how can we expect others to understand, let alone respect, our vision.

"If I am but for myself, what am I?" If we do not involve ourselves in the larger struggle for human rights, the struggle against ethnic cleansing, racism, oppression, then we not only diminish the larger agenda of human rights by our absence, but we diminish ourselves as Jews.

Israel's Jubilee 50

The Declarationof Independence

Eretz Yisrael was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped. Here they first attained to statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave the world the eternal Book of Books.

After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people kept faith with it throughout their dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom.

Impelled by this historic and traditional attachment, Jews strove in every successive generation to re-establish themselves in their ancient homeland. In recent decades they returned in their masses. Pioneers, ma'pilim and defenders, they made deserts bloom, revived the Hebrew language, built villages and towns and created a thriving community, controlling its own economy and culture, loving peace but knowing how to defend itself, bringing the blessings of progress to all the country's inhabitants, and aspiring towards independent nationhood.

In the year 5657 (1897), at the summons of the spiritual father of the Jewish State, Theodor Herzl, the First Zionist Congress convened and proclaimed the right of the Jewish people to national rebirth in its own country.

This right was recognized in the Balfour Declaration of the 2nd November, 1917, and reaffirmed in the mandate of the League of Nations which, in particular, gave international sanction to the historic connection between the Jewish people and Eretz Yisrael and to the right of the Jewish people to rebuild its national home.

The catastrophe which recently befell the Jewish people – the massacre of millions of Jews in Europe – was another clear demonstration of the urgency of solving the problem of its homelessness by re-establishing in Eretz Yisrael the Jewish State, which would open the gates of the homeland wide to every Jew and confer upon the Jewish people the status of a fully privileged member of the comity of nations.

Survivors of the Nazi holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz Yisrael, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a life of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland.

In World War II, the Jewish community of this country contributed its full share to the struggle of the freedom and peace-loving nations against the forces of Nazi wickedness and, by the blood of its soldiers and its war effort, gained the right to be reckoned among the peoples who founded the United Nations.

On the 29th November, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael; the General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael to take such steps as were necessary on their part for the implementation of that resolution. This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their state is irrevocable.

Accordingly, we members of the People's Council, representatives of the Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael and of the Zionist movement, are here assembled on the day of the termination of the British mandate over Eretz Yisrael and by virtue of our natural and historic right and on the strength of the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly, hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael, to be known as the State of Israel.

We declare that, with effect from the moment of the termination of this mandate, being tonight, the eve of Sabbath, the 6th Iyar, 5708 (15th May, 1948), until the establishment of the elected, regular authorities of the State in accordance with the constitution which shall be adopted by the Elected Constituent Assembly not later than the 1st October, 1948, the People's Council shall act as a Provisional Council of State, and its executive organ, the People's Administration, shall be the Provisional Government of the Jewish State, to be called Israel.

The State of Israel will be open for Jewish immigration and for the ingathering of the exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the holy places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the charter of the United Nations.

The State of Israel is prepared to cooperate with the agencies and representatives of the United Nations in implementing the resolution of the General Assembly of the 29th November, 1947, and will take steps to bring about the economic union of the whole of Eretz Yisrael.

We appeal to the United Nations to assist the Jewish people in the building-up of its State and to receive the State of Israel into the comity of nations.

We appeal – in the very midst of the onslaught launched against us now for months – to the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the up-building of the State on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its provisional and permanent institutions.

We extend our hand to all neighboring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighborliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of cooperation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish people settled in its own land. The State of Israel is prepared to do its share in common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East.

We appeal to the Jewish people throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz Yisrael in the tasks of immigration and upbuilding and to stand by them in the great struggle for the realization of the age-old dream – the redemption of Israel.

Placing our trust in the almighty, we affix our signatures to this proclamation at this session of the Provisional Council of State, on the soil of the homeland, in the city of Tel Aviv, on this Sabbath eve, the 5th day of Iyar, 5708 (14th May, 1948).

When I was young,
the country was young too.
My father was everybody's father.
When I was happy, the country was happy, when I jumped Upon her, she jumped under me.
The grass that covered her in spring
Softened me too.
Her soil in summer pained me
As parched skin in my soles.
When I loved
Immensely, her independence was announced, when my hair
Waved, her banners waved. When I fought,
She fought. When I rose, she rose too, and when I declined
She began declining too.

Now, I part from all that.
Like a thing glued on to something when the glue dries up.
I separate and roll into myself.

Yehuda Amichai, Time, 1978.

By SHIRA HERZOG

I was born with the state, in the era of togetherness. I matured with the state, in the era of individualism.

Think of Israel in the past and the words that come to mind are: solidarity, dedication, community, sacrifice, austerity, commitment, consensus. Think of Israel today and the words are: fragmentation, polarization, individualism, affluence, skepticism, conflict. As the country has become stronger and more pluralistic, many lament the loss of the pioneering spirit,that characterized the early days.

In 1948 it all seemed simple. Or is that what we want to believe?

The challenges were as complex, if not greater in 1948, but the commitment and hope were concentrated on one superior goal – the establishment of a Jewish state. The dream of the state was the glue, the myth and the consensus that bound people divided by origin, values and religious belief. The dream gave them confidence in themselves and in the rocky road they chose to follow. For that they are to be envied by my generation. Looking back at those early years, it is easy to be critical of the naivete, simplicity and even blindness to the complex external and internal realities of the time. But in the first decade of the state, the values of the collective experience reigned supreme. The individual naturally sacrificed his or her aspirations for the sake of the larger whole. The discourse was one of historic dreams, national goals and big solutions.The focus was on building a strong army of national unity, creating the infrastructure of a stable economy and parliamentary democracy, making the dessert bloom and absorbing one million immigrants.

Ben-Gurion towered over it all – small in physical stature, but otherwise a giant man who led his people through the gates of statehood and made the state and its authority all-important. His language was one of a joint destiny, socialism, the state as the provider for its citizens, and one homogenous, new "Israeli" culture. Ben-Gurion, the visionary, was also the ultimate pragmatist. He knew that many of the fundamental questions of identity facing the new state could not be easily resolved and he was determined to find the compromises that would allow it to survive and develop. A few months after the establishment of the state, he warned that, "We will disappoint the Zionist movement and miss the mark if suddenly we should begin philosophizing about who I am and what I am. Right now the only question that stands before us is a pragmatic one, and we must solve it..."

My generation reaped the fruits of those early, yeoman efforts. We matured in a vibrant democracy that prevailed in spite of an ongoing state of war and an all-powerful army. We matured in a society enriched by the cultures of Jews from across the Middle East and Europe. We matured in an economy that developed from a state-controlled, socialist system to a free-market, export-oriented one that ranks among the fastest growing in the world. We lived in the security granted by a powerful army that provided Israel with the deterrence that eventually convinced Arab governments the country was there to stay. We expressed ourselves in the revived Hebrew language, ranging from the highest literary forms to a new slang that had never existed in the centuries of Diaspora. We were proud of our "new Israeli" identity. We were born into the revolution, into a state that for us was a fact, and not a dream.

But my generation has also dealt with the consequences of the sometimes hasty decisions that were made in those early years. We were not as sheltered by the dream as the generation that preceded us: we saw the problems more clearly; we challenged the judgment of our leaders more openly; we questioned what had been first principles; we criticized the simple answers as we were drawn to the complexities; our discourse became more intensely personal as we replaced the "we" with the "I". This process was inevitable, as in any post-revolutionary society, but it was also the result of indigenous Israeli developments.

The '60s were the decade of transition . Politically, socially, culturally and economically the change could be discerned. The "Lavon affair" split Mapai (forerunner of the Labor party) and sowed the seeds of its demise a decade later. A new generation of technocrats matured, poised to usher Israel into the economy of the 21st century. A crop of young authors created a more complex literary enterprise that was colored in shades of grey when reflecting the national experience. Mizrachi (Sephardi) immigrants began to question the unidimensional "melting pot" imposed on them by the Mapai establishment. American rock culture slowly penetrated the dance halls and displaced Israeli folk music. But the watershed moment came in six short days and a lightning military victory in June,1967.

The Six Day War transformed Israel's David into a Goliath virtually overnight and irrevocably changed the national agenda. If until 1967 the key national challenge was to build the state, since 1967 it has been to determine the future of the territories captured as a result of the Six Day War. My generation is the bridge between the generation of 1948 which had accepted the 1949 borders as a necessary compromise that would allow the state to develop, and the post-1967 generation which knows only an Israel in its expanded borders. The occupation and the subsequent settlement movement reopened the fundamental national debate not only over security and borders, but over identity, democracy, morality and the challenge of power for the modern-day Israeli soldier and citizen. Perhaps even more than 1948, 1967 became the dividing line between the pre-state generation and the generation born into the state.

Six years later, the euphoria of power was shattered as the 1973 Yom Kippur War caught Israel by surprise. That war, in which over 2000 soldiers were killed and thousands more were wounded, resulted in the first serious analysis of the limits of military power. The private and public trauma of 1973 found its political expression in the election of 1977, when Herut, the "outsider" in Israeli politics, formed a government for the first time. The right was in power, forever to change the face of Israeli politics.

Since then, the fissures in Israeli society – between religious and secular visions of the state, Zionism and "post-Zionism," Ashkenazi and Mizrachi Israelis, Jews and Arabs within the "Green Line," Israelis and Palestinians, rich and poor, veterans and newcomers – have all been exacerbated.

At 50 Israel is no less confident, creative and entrepreneurial, but it is also more fractious, divisive and polarized. My generation of Israelis sees the world through a different lens. In our open society, for better or worse, individual will is the highest value and its expression permeates the fabric of Israel on so many levels.

The single, social-democratic vision of Zionism, which dominated the early decades and was joined by moderate religious Zionists and the centrist, Liberal Zionists, has given way to a plurality of "Zionisms." Today, two visions are at the heart of the national debate. The one, secular and universalistic, sees Israel as part of the western world, making peace on the basis of a generous territorial compromise and governed by the principles of democracy. The second defines the country's identity in more forceful, nationalist and parochial terms. It views the Zionist vision as incorporating most of the West Bank (in spite of Oslo and in an effort to minimize its damage), puts little faith in a peace agreement with the Palestinians, and is critical of the secular Zionist vision as less "authentic" and less "Jewish."

In the early years, the state was the supreme authority. Statism (mamlachtiut) was the term used by Ben-Gurion to describe his efforts to unite a disparate Yishuv, with different militias and social support systems, into a unified social structure. The IDF, Israel's army, became the ultimate expression of the state and its power. Today there is a diminution of the "stateness" of Israeli society, and with it a "fading of the khaki," a concomitant questioning of the IDF's authority by civil bodies and citizens. The demonstrations in the street by reserve soldiers during the 1982 Invasion of Lebanon shattered the Israeli consensus of war as a "no-choice" option, and served as a warning to Israeli leaders facing future decisions on controversial military action.

Israel's political landscape has changed

Israel's political landscape has also changed dramatically. The early years of the Yishuv and the state were dominated by one party which remained in power for an unprecedented 44 years in western democracies (1933-1977). Israel's system of proportional representation worked effectively as long as Mapai consistently gained a plurality of the vote and was joined by the moderate religious-Zionist camp to represent a true majority of the population. Herut's rise to power in 1977 heralded a new era in which two large parties were equally strong, and the weaknesses of the proportional representation system became evident. As the religious-Zionist camp moved firmly to the right and identified with Herut on the territorial issue, the virtual draw in national elections led to the formation of two successive national unity governments in the '80s. Israel's political history entered its third stage with the elections of 1996. The direct election of the prime minister and the choice of two ballots for each voter, resulted in a decline of the two dominant parties and a strengthening of parties that represent special interests. Israel's Knesset is now an accurate reflection of the divisions in its society and the new, pluralistic structure seems more likely to accentuate divisions than to encourage accommodation.

Israel's immigrants have contributed to, and have benefited from, the new "sectorization" of Israeli society. Shas, Gesher, and the Russian immigrant party are all political expressions of groups who define themselves foremost in ethnic terms and whose political and social demands reflect a narrow self-interest. They have refused to accept what they perceive as the patronizing attitude of the old elite and they proudly claim their rightful place in the Israeli political mosaic. Similarly, Israel's Arab citizens see themselves as an ethnic minority deserving of equal opportunity and rights.

For Israel at 50, the great divide appears to be the debate over the future relationship with the Palestinians. Oslo, per se, may be "dead". But like many observers, I believe that the centre in Israeli politics, in both Labor and Likud, is prepared to make a historic compromise with the Palestinians based on significant territorial concessions. Political exigencies and the ideology of any given leader may militate against such a resolution right now, but since the mid-70s, the tide of history has moved irreversibly in this direction. The mainstream in Israeli politics and, hopefully, the Palestinian community, will remain committed to what has courageously begun. The more profound debate is over the shape of community, identity and civility. If disparate visions are held to as strongly as it now seems, how will Israelis unite and what will be the glue that binds them together?

The assassination of Yitzhak Rabin in 1995 made Israel more sober, more suspicious and more bitter. The ongoing debate over crucial national choices unfolds in the shadow of that bloody night. For me and many in Israel, the great fear since then has been that we may have lost the ability to disagree. This, after all, is the true test of a civilized society. It is this ability that my generation must regain.

Israel at 50 like my generation of Israelis, is at a mid-life point. Our rich and varied worlds are those of rationalism and mysticism, innovation and nostalgia for the past, a search for roots through Zen and the study of ancient Jewish texts, the Ashram and the black hat, the synagogue and the country club, Beth El and Tel Aviv. For a country, just as for an individual, a mid-life crisis can herald a burst of creativity and a spiritual reawakening, but it can also portend a waning of physical and mental energy. This is the choice that we face today. To create the state required vision and faith laced with responsibility, self-sacrifice, tenacity, single-mindedness, good fortune and hard work. To continue the journey and to pass the torch responsibly will require no less of a commitment.

A personal reflection

By RABBI GUNTHER PLAUT

Fifty may seem an insignificant number in the context of history, especially the history of a nation that reckons itself by millennia rather than centuries. So, in true rabbinic fashion, I look for a proper defence of the celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary by consulting our sacred sources.

The jubilee year described in the Torah (Leviticus, 25) seems to be the obvious justification, but its laws of redistributing all real estate every 50 years are no longer enforceable, since the tribal properties are impossible to ascertain today. The other passage in the Torah that landmarks 50 deals with priests who must retire at that age (Numbers 8:23-26). But that rule is not applicable to a nation, even one called "a kingdom of priests" (Exodus 19:6).

The best parallel available is in Pirkei Avot (5:21), which tells us that a person reaching his 50th year acquires the capacity to give eitzah, advice.

If that passage is applicable to a nation like Israel, what does that mean to us at this juncture?

Israel has not waited until this point to advise Diaspora Jews about their insecure future. "Come and make aliyah," it has said all along. "It is advice you'd better heed before it's too late."

But we in the Diaspora — even though we cannot call on this kind of mishnaic authority for support — are prepared to return the favor and give counsel to Israel. We know what its government should or should not do, how the Arabs are to be handled and how the internal conflicts of the nation can be resolved.

IDF soldiers greeting Yemenite olim, 1950

In both cases, eitzah is cheap, and I must look elsewhere to make 50 come to life.

My mind goes back to Nov. 29, 1947. It was Shabbat, but many of us in Chicago forsook the habitual menuchah that afternoon and made our way to the Civic Opera. Some thousand Jews had assembled there – to be present when the result of an historic vote would be announced. The United Nations was in session and its members were casting ballots on the Palestine partition plan. Arab nations and their friends opposed it, most Jews and many Western nations endorsed it. If approved, the land would be divided between an Arab entity and a Jewish one. For the first time in nearly 2,000 years, we would be accorded international recognition on our own land. A "yes" vote would mean the future establishment of a Jewish state.

Many doubted that our side had a chance, but at that moment we could not have a pessimistic perspective. The gevirim of American Jewry, led by the legendary Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, were present to talk to us. My wife and I needed to be there.

My imagination fails me when I try to recreate the sentiment of that afternoon. While the UN argued and began the process of voting, we sang and listened to the worthies who addressed us. Many of us — with the Holocaust still fresh in our memories — prayed that we might at last determine our future as a people and no longer need to wander the highways of history.

Rabbi Wise had addressed us and was sitting with the other speakers on the stage. It was getting late; the results should be available any moment. Suddenly, a young man ran across the stage and handed the rabbi a piece of paper. He looked at it and broke out in tears; I thought the worst had happened. I still see him struggling to get to his feet and then walking to the lectern as if in a dream. In the dead quiet of the magnificent theatre he raised the paper like a flag.

"Fellow Jews," he said hoarsely, his voice choked with tears, "we have a Jewish state!"

The effect was one I remember as clearly as anything in my life: we jumped to our feet in uncontrolled joy, and then burst into the street, dancing, chanting, celebrating.

I cannot recall where I was a few months later when David Ben-Gurion announced the establishment of the Jewish state. For me, Yom Ha'atzma'ut started on Nov. 29, 1947.

That was then. Now, 50 years later, how do we, as Jews living in the Diaspora, see the Jewish nation that has emerged into the limelight of history? And in turn, how do Israelis see us?

Perhaps the most important fact is that the old fear of Jewish homelessness is gone – we now take Israel for granted. We love it, though not with the puppy love that was ours some decades ago. Israel has grown from a political toddler into a sturdy, self-reliant nation. We have close ties with our friends and families there, and the whole country is part of our consciousness. Its pains are ours; its successes enlarge our Diaspora lives. But short of some desperate crisis that would find us backing it without reserve, we no longer look at Israel through rose-tinted spectacles and no longer hesitate to see its weaknesses as well as its strengths.

We are a divided, and all too often polarized, Diaspora, and there are observable strains in our relationship. Moreover, the balance is shifting, and in the near future we will no longer be the majority of the world's Jewish population. That majority will be in Israel; Jews are presently increasing in numbers, primarily due to the continuing Russian aliyah. (In contrast, western aliyah is at a standstill and, with no major catastrophe in the offing, it will not come to life until Israel has stabilized its internal existence and has normalized its relations with the Palestinians.) While there will likely still be some violent convulsions, Israel's existence is not in doubt, though its worst enemies wish it away, drowned in the waters of oblivion.

It is Israel's internal problems that affect us here. Religious pluralism, a given in the Diaspora, is still an embattled issue in Israel. As long as it is impervious to peaceful accommodation, it will be a divisive element in Israel-Diaspora relations.

Of course, we in North America are part of the problem. Most of us have never been to Israel and don't know Hebrew as a living tongue. With the weight of Jewish life shifting to Israel in an ever increasing fashion, we can't fully identify ourselves with its culture unless we have a working knowledge of Hebrew. That leaves our elders stranded on the shoals of regret, but at least they still have the old familial sentiment that binds them to the people and the land of Israel.

It is different with our young people. Unless they become familiar with Israel's everyday realities — through some physical experience in the land, buttressed by knowing a modicum of Hebrew — the gap will widen, for they have not shared in the hopes and fears of our past, when our hearts were young and full of unbounded love.

That is why, for many years, I have proposed that Diaspora Jews adopt a 614th mitzvah: to visit Israel at least once every seven years and to send their young people there for a year of study before attending a Diaspora university. Of course, not all Jews can or will follow this kind of self-imposed obligation, but then, except for our experience at Sinai, we never seem to have been of one mind on anything. If enough of our family will enter into a covenant to follow such a program, it may catch on and make the 100th anniversary of the State a jubilee year of extraordinary proportions.

Meanwhile, Israel is in political turmoil at this writing. It is religiously divided as never before, not just between Orthodox and non-Orthodox factions, but between those who have a sense of the religious (of whatever coloration) and the non-religious, often dubbed the "seculars." Those divisions scare me: while I think that in the long run Israel has secured its external existence, another war is looming, if it has not already started – a war (non-bloody, I hope) between Jews and Jews. The Talmud tells us that the Romans were able to conquer Jerusalem only because of internal Jewish conflict that sapped the defenders' united strength and purpose. Right now, there are still political conventions to contain this struggle, but they will not last forever. The battle will be fought under discernably different banners: one party believing it is fighting for God and a truly "Jewish state," and the other, wanting to uphold the freedoms of democracy and aim for a state that will enable its people to choose their own way of life. The present policy of governing by threat-and-concession is exhausting its efficacy.

The first casualty in the fight will be the monopoly of the chief rabbinate over marriages. Within the next decade or two, civil marriage in Israel will become a reality, and not long thereafter there will be other breaches in the fabric of politico-religious tradition. When such changes occur, will Israelis view us Diaspora Jews with different eyes?

Today, many of them consider us a vanishing species, especially those of us who live in North America, where mixed marriages are increasing, the birth rate is plunging and assimilation reigns all-pervasive. Our numbers are shrinking, and Israelis will increasingly see us as irrelevant, especially when the political clout of U.S. Jews declines even further. Ironically, while Diaspora Jews may be seen as less important to the Jewish state, emigration from Israel is likely to remain an alluring alternative to the dangers and uncertainties of Israelis' lives. Nothing is simple when it comes to foretelling the Jewish future, except that tomorrow Israel will fortify its status as the cultural centre of the Jewish people.

Will a religious renewal accompany this development? Will there be a return to the social idealism of chalutziyut that I was privileged to observe when I first visited the land in 1935? Whatever happens, our love for Israel will remain firm and enable us to call ourselves partners in the shaping of our people's future.

Israel's Jubilee 50

The theological significance of Israel

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Imagine what it was like to be a Jewish teacher or a Jewish parent three hundred years ago. You want to make your students or children proud of their Jewish identity. You explain to them that the land of Israel is an integral part of Jewish identity and that ideally Jews are supposed to be an independent, self-governing people living freely in their own land. And then you explain to your students or children that for almost two millennia that has not been the case. "Yes," you might say, "we have been powerless and persecuted for many centuries in a row, but we believe that that is simply an aberration, a temporary state of affairs."

It is difficult for me as a twentieth century Jewish educator to imagine how Jewish educators 300 (or 500 or 800 or 1200 or 1500) years ago managed to instill feelings of Jewish pride in their disciples. What could they say about the nature of the relationship between God and His people, Israel? How did they explain the fact that it looked as if God had abandoned His people?

Jews who lived in Christian countries often did hear the explanation that God had abandoned them; the Christians told them He had. The powerless, rootless, stateless nature of Jewish existence was proof, for Christian thinkers, of what happens to people who reject God and murder His "son."

What other explanation was available to Jewish thinkers? Only the well-worn argument that if Jews suffer it must be for their own sins, not, to be sure, the sin of killing Jesus, but some other sin(s). Since, as Ecclesiastes teaches us, "There is no person on earth who does only good and does not sin," it was not hard to come up with some moralistic explanation of why the Jews continued to suffer. Yet these explanations were not always easy to swallow.

The last half-century of Jewish history, with the tremendous accomplishment of the founding of the State of Israel, would seem to solve theological problems for Jews. Yet it has also been a source of new and perhaps more difficult questions.

First of all, the very existence of the Jewish state has represented a grave problem for many Christian theologians. Christianity had never abandoned Augustine's theological argument of the fourth century that "No one can fail to see that in every land where the Jews are scattered they mourn for the loss of their kingdom and are in terrified subjection to the immensely superior number of Christians...So to the end of the seven days of time, the continued preservation of the Jews will be a proof to believing Christians of the subjection merited by those who...put the Lord to death." Even a mere 55 years ago, Karl Barth, an anti-Nazi and generally philo-Semitic Christian thinker, understood the fate of Jews who were being butchered in the Holocaust as yet another example of the way in which Jews "give witness" to the truth of Christianity through their suffering. In his Church Dogmatics, Barth writes that "the Jews of the ghetto give this demonstration involuntarily, joylessly and ingloriously, but they do give it. They have nothing to attest to the world but the shadow of the cross of Jesus Christ that falls upon them. But they, too, do actually and necessarily attest Jesus Christ Himself" through their continued suffering.

How has Christian theology then adjusted itself to the new reality of Jewish power and Jewish success?

With great difficulty and often with great hesitancy. Many Jews, myself included, feel that Christianity's desire to continue to view Jews as victims may explain such phenomena as incessant Christian criticism of policies of the State, or Christian clergy's silence in the days before the Six Day War when many people in the world believed that the Jewish state was in danger of being destroyed, or even the continued reluctance of the Vatican to recognize and establish full diplomatic relations with the State of Israel.

But how should Jewish theology relate to the creation and growth of the State of Israel?

To the best of my knowledge, no Jewish theologian offers what would be, in theory, the simplest theological explanation. Let us recall that Jews had always rationalized the sufferings of the past as being punishments for our sins. "On account of our sins we were exiled from our land," reads the traditional liturgy. Would it then make sense to argue the corollary: that the wondrous turn of events at the end of the twentieth century – the creation of the State of Israel – should be seen as a divine reward?

From the point of view of almost any Jewish theologian, this does not make sense. Is our current generation more righteous than the Jews who lived for the last 2000 years who did not merit returning to the land?

Israel's Jubilee 50

Then what theological sense can one make of the amazing turn in the fortunes of the Jewish people in recent years? Traditional Jews have taken two mutually exclusive approaches to the theological significance of the State.

In some haredi circles, the State of Israel is understood simply as a hubristic effort to defy God's plan for the world. The State, the argument goes, is obviously based on defiance of God's Torah, for it was founded and is still governed by non-observant Jews. The State, then, is simply another example of sinful behavior.

Obviously, this anti-Zionist theology has not been the dominant Jewish religious position. For the last century, there has been another Jewish theological explanation. This explanation is founded on the belief that God will – in messianic times – intervene dramatically in world affairs to improve the lot of the Jews even if they are not deserving.

The dramatic developments of the re-establishment of Jewish sovereignty in the land of Israel may then be seen as the beginning of messianic times, even if the Jewish people are not currently worthy of reward. Close to one hundred years ago the great Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief rabbi of modern Israel, began to develop the other necessary and perhaps radical step in the theological analysis that allows traditional Jews to view our times as messianic – the claim that the divine messianic plan could be fulfilled through the efforts of the avowedly secular founders of modern Zionism.

Many see clear benefits from the growth of this theological movement. First of all, it allows for a healthy mixture of independent human effort coupled with reliance on God. Anti-Zionist theology, on the other hand, continues to be based on a messianic quiescence, on a belief that, aside from observing mitzvot, there really is nothing for humans to do to improve our lot in the world. God alone can effect our redemption.

The other great benefit of the development of Rabbi Kook's theology is that it allowed for a positive religious attitude to the non-religious pioneers who were working tirelessly to rebuild the land of Israel. Rabbi Kook was always pained by the irreligiosity of Zionist leaders. But that did not stop him from attributing great theological significance to their efforts. In one of Rabbi Kook's most dramatic and controversial speeches, his eulogy for Theodor Herzl in 1904, Rabbi Kook suggested that Herzl had actually been the Messiah son of Joseph, the more worldly-oriented messianic leader who tradition predicted would arrive just before the coming of the final redeemer, the Messiah son of David.

Rabbi Kook died 13 years before the State of Israel was established. His writings describe the theoretical holiness of the Zionist enterprise and of the Zionist idea. But they naturally say nothing explicit about the status of the State itself. As Aviezer Ravitzky has argued (in his Messianism, Zionism and Jewish Religious Radicalism [1996]), it was Rabbi Kook's son, Rabbi Zvi Yehudah Kook, and his followers who took the next step in the development of this theology by attributing a true messianic significance to the State as it exists today.

The growth of such messianic thinking today in our modern, technologically-advanced world surprises many observers. On closer reflection, however, it should not.

In a brilliant essay entitled Messianic Postures of Ashkenazim and Sephardim (in Studies of the Leo Baeck Institute [1967]), Gerson Cohen argued that messianic activism in Jewish history is not, as some might think, to be found in the persecuted communities, such as those of Germany during the Crusades. Jews there may have comforted themselves with a passive, quietistic messianic hope but they did not "see" the Messiah as having arrived. Yet in Spain during its so-called Golden Age, many Jews believed that the Messiah had come or that they could determine with certainty when he would be coming. Cohen tells us that "rationalism, science, philosophy, and Hebrew classicism were the hallmarks of this group" of messianic activists. So we should not be surprised that today "modern" religious people who feel that science and technology help them understand the world better than ever before, also feel that they are now capable of identifying an ongoing messianic process, in ways that our grandparents in Eastern Europe would never have done.

The theoretical quietistic belief in the Messiah – that one day the world will be improved in a manner more fitting with God's plan for us – has, in many difficult periods of Jewish history, buoyed failing spirits and inspired Jews to work hard at making this world better. By contrast, there have been disastrous consequences in some historical periods when Jews seized upon the activist belief that messianic times were upon them. There is cause for such concerns today.

Messianists in Israel today use their determination that the State of

State of Israel

Israel has messianic significance as the decisive factor when making political decisions. As early as 1961, Rabbi Zvi Yehudah Kook gave a speech (later published in his Linetivot Yisrael, pp. 234-237) in which he argued against any restructuring of or diminution of the powers of the Israel Chief Rabbinate, changes that, he claimed, went against "that which we know and understand and see through the true vision, that the hand of God is stretched out towards us in the manifestation of the Revealed End (hakets ha-meguleh)."

As Ravitzky has shown, it was really only after the Six Day War that this theological understanding began to play a forceful role in the politics of the state. "Rabbi Zvi Yehudah Kook," Ravitzky writes (pp. 131-132), "goes so far as to identify the eternal Israel and its transcendent power with the political and military power of the State of Israel. 'The State of Israel [wrote Rabbi Zvi Yehudah] is divine... Not only can/must there be no retreat from [a single] kilometre of the Land of Israel, God forbid, but, on the contrary, we shall conquer and liberate more and more...'"

While messianists accept the state that was set up for them by secular Jews, they have opposed some of the most basic beliefs of those secular Jews. We must recall that a crucial goal of the secular Zionist movement was to "return the Jews to history," to make the Jewish people function like any other national group (if perhaps on a higher moral level) by making the kinds of decisions that any nation-state makes. The messianist theologians, with all their support of Zionism, have done their best to retard that process, to force the State of Israel to decide matters of policy not on the basis of concerns of security and international politics but on the basis of messianic ideas. (To be sure, many messianists cite security concerns when they argue against the "return" of land but they do so only to dress up their theology in secular language. A true messianist would oppose the "return" of land as a reversal of the divine messianic promise, even if he/she were convinced by political and military analysis that such a move would save lives.)

Messianist theology today not only rejects secular ideology; it also distances secular and religious Jews from each other. As we recall, the original messianist understanding of Zionism, in the thought of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, was a useful way to build bridges between religious and non-religious Jews. Religious Jews said to themselves that the non-religious Jews were fulfilling a crucial mitzvah by pursuing the Zionist agenda even if they did not realize it. Messianist theology in its current form, however, makes it impossible for many religious and non-religious Jews to converse about issues that are crucial to the Jewish future. To be sure there are some thoughtful non-religious Jews who oppose territorial compromise for security reasons, just as there are some serious religious Jews who, for religious reasons, support the current peace process. But both of these groups are small minorities. The overwhelming majority of religious Jews, caught up by a century of messianic rhetoric, oppose territorial compromise. The clear majority of the secular population, who analyze the question from a political science perspective, advocate splitting the land between Palestinians and Jews. There is, sadly, no real room for dialogue between messianists and secularists. It is ironic that the spiritual descendants of Rabbi Kook now use their messianic belief to erect the biggest wall ever seen in Israel between religious and secular Jews.

Are there other theological models for relating positively to the State of Israel without imputing messianic significance to it?

In 1985, Rabbi David Hartman of Jerusalem (formerly of Montreal) wrote a controversial book suggesting a very new type of Jewish theology. In A Living Covenant Hartman argued that God's personal will should be seen only in the realm of mitzvot, not in the realm of history. Hartman applies the rabbinic saying "the world pursues its normal course" basically to all of history. God's will and God's attitude to any given generation is not to be learned by studying the state of the world but only by studying Torah. "Jewish history should not be seen from a theological viewpoint... We cannot decide which generation God loved more or less by considering who was the recipient of greater miracles."

Such an approach is useful for Hartman, who himself is a committed Zionist and a religious Jew who does not accept a messianic theology. But the radical nature of Hartman's theology, essentially saying that God does not function in history, guarantees that Hartman's approach will not win many followers in the religious world. In fact, Rabbi Abraham D. Cohen of Thornhill recently wrote a thoughtful and very critical analysis of God and Redemption in the Thought of David Hartman (Modern Judaism 1997) in which he showed the heterodox nature of Hartman's approach.

For many religious Jews, the great theological task of the 20th century has not yet been accomplished. Many of us still await a definitive theology that will give religious meaning to the State of Israel without mystifying and messianizing the state. But the lack of an overarching theological explanation should not stop us now from thanking God for the miracle of the State of Israel. Let us hope that in the second 50 years of the State, thoughtful Jews will continue to grapple with the question of Israel's theological significance.

Israel's Jubilee 50

Strategic situation marked by ups and downs

By BERNARD REICH

Israel's beginnings were inauspicious. Although both the United States and the Soviet Union supported the November 1947 United Nations partition plan and recognized the new state soon after its independence, that proclamation was greeted by a declaration of war from Israel's Arab neighbors.

Even as late as 1967, "politicide" was still considered a possibility, although, in retrospect, those concerns may seem overstated. Fifty years after independence, Israel continues to face hostile neighbors, albeit fewer of them, even as its international position has greatly improved. At 50, Israel's geostrategic prospects are substantial, although both adversity and challenges seem to grow with each new attainment and accomplishment.

The End of War?

Just as much of Jewish history is recounted in negatives (the destruction of the Temple, the creation of the Diaspora, anti-Semitism, the Holocaust), Israel's brief history is focused on the conflict with its Arab neighbors. During its first 50 years, Israel has fought six major wars and engaged in countless skirmishes with the Arabs who have challenged its right to exist, to be secure and to prosper.

The War of Independence in 1948-49 was long and costly – some 6,000 people were killed, about one percent of the Jewish population – and Israel was left in control of more territory than it had been allocated by the partition plan. But the war did not bring peace or acceptance. It demonstrated the loneliness of Israel's position. The country could not rely on any other country for assistance in its efforts to secure its independence. Although the war ended with armistice agreements that were intended to be the first steps toward peace, that hope soon evaporated amidst increasing tension that was manifested in acts of sabotage, shootings, and armed cross-border terror attacks.

The Sinai Campaign of 1956 dealt with an immediate set of threats posed by the growing militarization of Egypt, but peace again proved elusive.

Although there was no large-scale outbreak of hostilities between Israel and the Arab states for a decade thereafter, tensions remained high. Israel's regional and domestic situation was affected significantly by the Six Day War of 1967. Between 1949 and 1967 Israel was prepared to make peace with the Arab states on the basis of the 1949 armistice lines with minor modifications. But after the events of the spring of 1967, including the widespread fear of "politicide," many in Israel argued for a need to change the security situation, a view reinforced by religious and ideological-historical claims to territory.

The status of the areas acquired in the 1967 war has been a focus of the peace process ever since. The war improved Israel's geostrategic situation on the ground, but, perhaps more importantly, it helped to change the nature of the relationship with the United States from a rather ordinary bond of friendship into a special relationship that has grown significantly since that time.

The War of Attrition (1969-70) brought the United States and the Soviet Union to the centre of the dispute as they had not previously been, raising questions about the dangers attendant on the Arab-Israeli conflict, but it did not point to a clear path that might end the conflict.

The Yom Kippur War (1973) took Israel by surprise, and while the invading Egyptian and Syrian armies scored initial successes, Israel ultimately was able to reverse the situation. Nevertheless, despite its having been attacked by its Arab interlocutors, Israel was widely condemned in the international community and virtually all of the states of Africa with which it had had significant and positive relationships broke their ties to the Jewish State. The war eroded the optimism and self-assuredness of a population that had believed that the Arabs would not attack, given the relative strength of the two sides.

The Sadat initiative of 1977, the Begin response, and the Camp David accords that led to the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty of 1979, along with the treaty itself, ushered in an improved geostrategic position for Israel – its most populous and best equipped enemy was now neutralized and Israel faced a reduced threat from the Arab state it had fought in five wars. But, the "cold peace" with Egypt did not end the hostilities nor ensure tranquillity for the Jewish State.

"Operation Peace for Galilee" (the war in Lebanon in 1982) reaffirmed the Israeli concern about other Arab threats and the aborted Israel-Lebanon agreement of May 19, 1983 confirmed the disappointment that Israel could not expand the peace. Nevertheless, and despite the failure to gain further agreements with the Arab states, the period between the Lebanon war and the start of the Palestinian intifadah in December 1987 was rel-

Israel's Jubilee 50

Peace process was set in motion in Madrid

The U.S.-led war in early 1991 to evict Iraq from Kuwait, during which Israel was struck by some 40 Scud missiles launched by Saddam Hussein, raised new questions about Israel's geostrategic position and helped to prepare the path to the Madrid Middle East peace conference of October 1991.

The Madrid conference set in motion "the peace process" that has wrought a dramatic change in Israel's geostrategic situation. Despite the lack of tangible progress from Madrid itself, the Israeli-PLO meetings in Oslo and the agreement that they spawned have marked the most significant improvement in Israel's international situation since independence. Since 1993, Israel has made significant gains in its quest for peace and security and improving its relations with its Arab neighbors, though not without some setbacks, and it has expanded its international relationships.

Among the ancillary benefits of the improved regional situation was a growing establishment or expansion by Israel of diplomatic and trade relations with a large number of states in Africa and Asia, including such powers as China and India. As a consequence of the Madrid process, Israel has become a more acceptable member of the international community and its trade has grown dramatically. This has had the effect of a growing prosperity within Israel, providing an improved and substantial standard of living for its people.

Shimon Peres has referred to the diplomatic process since 1991 as the "art of the impossible." In 1948, it was impossible to conceive of 50 years of conflict and concord during which Israel has neither succumbed to, nor been fully successful in utilizing, six major wars to achieve peace and security.

After 50 years, the "impossible" has made considerable progress toward achievement, as manifested in the peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan. Comprehensive peace and tranquillity are not at hand – witness continuing difficulties in negotiations with the Palestinians over interim and "final status" issues and the absence of meaningful negotiations with Lebanon and Syria (the latter of whom continues to pose a formidable, nearly existential, challenge for Israel) – but a partial peace has been secured and talk is of facilitating the peace process, not of preparation for a seventh round of Arab-Israeli hostilities.

If relations with the contiguous states are mixed, relations with the Arab states further afield are equally complex. There are links with Morocco and Tunisia in the west and with Qatar and Oman in the east, but there is also substantial hostility from such Arab states as Libya and Iraq.

Failure to achieve comprehensive peace with all of its Arab neighbors has led Israel to pay particular attention to states situated just beyond, and among these a good deal of attention has been directed to Iran and Turkey. The relationship with these regional, Muslim powers has evolved through a series of stages since 1947; although both endorsed the minority UN plan that would have precluded an independent Jewish state, relations were soon established.

Israel's links with Iran were rather substantial, until they were aborted with the ouster of the Shah. The Khomeini regime broke all ties with Israel and has sustained strong animosity to the Jewish State even as it solidified its links with the PLO and maintained its virulent opposition to the Arab-Israeli peace process. Relations have been further strained by Tehran's ties to Hezbollah and other Lebanese-based extremist groups and its pursuit of non-conventional weapons and the long-range missiles to deliver them.

In the case of Turkey, the evolution has been slower but essentially unidirectional. It has evolved from an aloofness in the early years of Israel's independence to a virtual strategic alliance today that includes

The Special Relationship

The special relationship between Israel and the United States is perhaps the most interesting if complex geostrategic achievement of the first 50 years since Israel's independence.

At Israel's birth the United States seemed to be a dispassionate, almost uninterested midwife. Its role was essential and unconventional, but also unpredictable and hotly debated in U.S. policy circles. Today, some of the debate continues and there are periods of discord in U.S.-Israeli relations. But there is little doubt about the overall nature of U.S. support for its small, still embattled, ally.

The United States and Israel are joined in an unparalleled and complex relationship aimed at assuring Israel's survival, security and well-being. This special relationship rests on ideological, emotional and moral pillars and on a commitment to democratic principles buttressed by strategic and political factors. Shared ideals and values sustain a strong psychological bond, as do generally parallel, if not always congruent, political and economic interests. The relationship has endured over decades, surviving numerous crises and evolving over time from a more or less traditional one into the special relationship of today. It goes well beyond that of military alliances that are built solely on a common hostility to another party and are often marriages of convenience of quite dissimilar parties that would not otherwise have much in common.

Despite the positive character of U.S.-Israeli links, perfect congruence of perspective and policy between the two partners is rare and points of discord and difficulty develop from time to time; but these are not permanently damaging and there is a rapid recovery and a return to close ties. Endurance and resilience are trademarks of this special relationship, the hallmark of which is America's often restated "unshakable commitment" to Israel's security.

Toward the Next 50 Years

Despite the improvement in Israel's international position, it is still something of a "pariah state" in the international community. Arab and Muslim animosity has only partially abated. Israel's growing international relationships have encompassed many of the most important states in the international system, although not all these links can be described as warm and cordial. The ambivalence of Israel's position is noted by the United Nations. Although the UN helped to "create" Israel via the partition plan and soon admitted Israel to membership, it has rarely treated Israel as it does virtually all of its other member states.

Israel denied membership in Mideast groups

Hundreds of resolutions have condemned Israel, and the country has been precluded from playing a major role in the world body by a combination of Arab, Muslim and non-aligned states (and in the past by the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc). Israel saw the UN describe Zionism as racism in 1975 and had to await the end of the Cold War for the odious resolution to be rescinded.

Despite a general improvement of its position in the UN, that body is still the venue for anti-Israel resolutions and actions. Israel is still denied membership in any Middle Eastern regional groupings in the UN system and it is still the target of unfair criticism on a consistent, if somewhat less frequent, basis. At the same time, membership in the UN accords legitimacy to Israel sovereignty and a vehicle for Israel's diplomats and governmental figures to establish and sustain important contacts in the international structure.

For all its tribulations, Israel enters its 51st year of modern independence having fulfilled the Zionist imperative of "ingathering the exiles" and melding them into an Israeli personality. Despite the human and economic costs of six major wars, Israelis have created a large and robust economy that defies all predictions, creating a high standard of living for a burgeoning population that equally enjoys the fruits of a thriving democratic tradition. Nevertheless, Israel still faces formidable geostrategic challenges. Despite an improving international position and growing links worldwide, it remains a pariah to some, including many of its immediate neighbors.

After 50 years, the "impossible" has made considerable progress toward achievement. Comprehensive peace is not at hand, but a partial peace has been secured and talk is of facilitating the peace process, not of preparations for a seventh round of Arab-Israeli hostilities.

Rescue operations central to Israel's past

By BARUCH GUR

One of the most important lessons to be learned from the Holocaust and one that has been a principal motif throughout Jewish history is that Jews will never be abandoned, whatever their country or distress. The Jews of Israel, fighting for the their independence and sovereign existence, are prepared to risk their lives to rescue those of their brothers and sisters around the globe living in danger areas.

This article will describe some of Israel's outstanding rescue operations, great and small, of Jews from Arab and European countries during the early years of Israel's statehood, culminating with the rescue of Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry, in which I was personally involved.

This brief overview, however, does not allow me to go into the details of each and every operation.

Suffice to say the credo, "All Jews are responsible for one another," is no empty phrase. It underlies each and every rescue operation, some of whose details are still confidential.

Europe

Immediately after World War II, during the years 1944 to 1948, an entire underground network of escape and rescue for Jewish Holocaust survivors was organized throughout Europe. The network was partly spontaneous and partly organized by young Israelis scattered throughout Europe.

Many of these young participants were unaware that they were part of a network directed from Eretz Yisrael to assist those who would be travelling along the way from one country to another.

Even the small-scale attempt to smuggle out Soviet Jews, some of whom were Zionist activists trapped in eastern Europe, from the Balkan countries to Poland, was illegal. According to the Soviet Law of Repatriation in 1946, Jews of Polish extraction residing in the Soviet Union were allowed to return to Poland. Using the law as a springboard, youngsters from the Netzach and Hashomer Hatzair movements made concerted efforts to rescue their colleagues and fellow movement members scattered throughout the Soviet Union, including in camps in the Far East and in Asia, by smuggling them into Poland as Polish Jews.

Palestine was the goal, but British policy prevented refugees from reaching that destination. There were, thus, constant attempts to smuggle refugees to Palestine. They went by land but mainly by sea in the rickety ships of the Ma'apilim (the so-called Illegals) and the Haganah, the Yishuv's major political and underground forces.

Smuggling "illegals" into Palestine was a cat and mouse game between the mighty British Empire and the small Jewish Yishuv in Palestine. Generally, the British succeeded in preventing a massive entry of refugees into the country. The closed detention camps on Cyprus filled up rapidly with refugees who were brought there by the British. From time to time, however, boats did manage to break through the British blockage. There were even successful attempts to enter Palestine on foot via Syria and Lebanon.

Iraq

In the summer of 1947, a plane bringing Jews who had been smuggled out of Iraq, landed in Yavniel. During the War of Independence, there was growing fear for the fate of Jews in Arab lands, especially those in Iraq. The situation made the need to rescue them all the more acute. Shlomo Hillel was sent to Iraq to organize the rescue of Iraqi Jewry. He conceived the idea of smuggling them through Iran.

Hillel travelled to Tehran on a forged passport and for over a year organized the rescue of hundreds of youngsters, mostly Zionists, who risked their lives by illegally crossing the border between Iraq and Iran.

In 1950, he returned to Baghdad to negotiate with the Iraqi authorities under Operation Ezra and Nehemiah, designed to bring the Jewish community out of Iraq legally. As a result, in one of the largest airlifts in the years immediately following World War II, 104,000 Iraqi Jews arrived in Israel over 18 months in 1950 and 1951.

The Zionist underground in Iraq fully mobilized for this overt operation by organizing the transit of Jews from all over the country to Baghdad and preparing them for the rigors of the journey to Israel.

Masses of Iraqi Jews left the country. They gave up their property and their Iraqi citizenship. Upon the conclusion of Operation Ezra and Nehemiah, the Zionist underground was banned, once again, by the Iraqi authorities. Heading the Zionist activists were Robert Rodney, Ben Porat and others. In 1969, another underground network was banned and its leaders were executed.

struggle between the Muslim nationalists and the sultan intensified during the summer, causing much harm to Moroccan Jewry, especially to the Jews of Fez.

As a result, some 25,000 Jews registered for aliyah. Encouraged by the Israel-Zionist underground, many Jews left their homes and began their journey to Israel, wandering throughout Morocco. The Jewish Agency and the Mossad launched an emergency operation to evacuate the Jews wishing to immigrate to Israel. Aliyah transit camps were established en route to Casablanca.

In mid-1956, by order of the Moroccan government, the Aliyah Department was closed in Casablanca and the Jewish Agency emissaries were expelled from the country. The exits of several thousands of Jews were delayed.

Both the Mossad and the Jewish Agency organized rescue operations for these Jews, smuggling them out to Spain and to France, and from there, to Israel.

In a very tragic incident in January 1961, the Egoz, a ship carrying Jews from Morocco to Spain, sank. Twenty-three Jews perished. Their remains were brought to Israel with the approval of the king of Morocco in 1991, 30 years after their deaths.

Port Said, Egypt

In October 1956, during the Sinai Campaign, while the combined military forces of Israel, Britain and France were fighting in the Sinai and at the Suez Canal, a rescue team, headed by Lyova Eliav, set out by sea for Port Said to rescue and smuggle out the local Jewish community and bring them to Israel.

Romania

In 1959, thousands of new immigrants arrived from Romania, including members of the Zionist underground. The Jewish immigrants from Romania are best known for their successful integration into Israeli society. However, during the 1970s, the only way to assure the continued immigration of Romanian Jewry was through bribery. The Ceaucescu regime established a price list for its Jews, which the State of Israel was forced to pay in cash each year until Ceaucescu's fall.

Yemen

Most of Yemenite Jewry immigrated to Israel at the end of the War of Independence in the Magic Carpet airlift. In December 1959, 11 Jews were killed on their way to Israel in an operation in which Jews were to be smuggled into Israel via Africa and Southern Europe.

Entebbe

The rescue operation that gained international acclaim and became a legend in itself was the rescue of Jews from Entebbe.

An Air France plane on its way to Paris from Israel was skyjacked on June 27, 1976, by hijackers who boarded the plane in Athens and forced the crew to fly to Uganda. It became quickly quite clear that Idi Amin, the ruler of Uganda, had collaborated with the hijackers.

On July 4, in a daring military operation 4,000 kilometres from Israel, the IDF raided Uganda's Entebbe airport and freed more than 100 hostages. During the raid, the commander of the rescue unit, Yoni Netanyahu, was killed.

Entebbe became a symbol of courage and daring for Israeli soldiers, a hallmark of Israel's perseverance and commitment to the rescue of Jews and Israelis in danger.

Ethiopia

From 1984 to 1985, Operation Moses brought to Israel thousands of Jews from Ethiopia. This action was veiled in secrecy owing to the political sensitivity of Israel-Ethiopian relations.

In 1977, then foreign minister Moshe Dayan publicly disclosed that Israel was supplying arms to the Ethiopian government and that Israeli experts were aiding the regime in its war against the rebels. This statement elicited an angry reaction from the Ethiopian ruler Mengistu, who expelled all Israelis from the country. As a result, the plight of the Ethiopian Falashas, as they were then called, worsened.

Ethiopian representatives in Israel and Jewish organizations worldwide related that thousands of Ethiopian Jews had been killed during the civil war and that tens of thousands more had been expelled, becoming refugees.

Most fled to Sudan, where they were concentrated in special camps. In coordination with Israel's Mossad, the American CIA and with the Sudanese authorities, the evacuation of Ethiopian Jews from Sudan was planned. The code name for the evacuation was Operation Moses. From Nov. 21, 1984, until January 1985, Ethiopian Jews were airlifted to Israel in a steady stream of Hercules airplanes.

Unfortunately the news of the operation was leaked to the Israeli press. By order of Jafar Numeri, the Sudanese ruler, all rescue activities were stopped, thus trapping some 5,000 Jews in Sudan under abominable conditions.

On March 28, 1985, under the guise of bringing aid to hunger victims in Sudan, these remaining Jews were flown out to Israel in secret on American transport planes.

Before this operation, the Mossad, air force and naval commando personnel had carried out many rescue missions, bringing Jews in small groups from Sudan to Israel. A sea evacuation was uncovered in the wake of an incident with Sudanese soldiers and was brought to a halt.

Only recently have tales of the bravery and raw courage exhibited by Israel's navy and Mossad begun to be made public.

The situation of the Jews remaining in Ethiopia continued to deteriorate during the years of civil war. In 1991, after news reached Israel of severe clashes between the rebels and the Ethiopian government, a decision was made to bring the remainder of Ethiopian Jewry to Israel.

Uri Lubrani conducted feverish negotiations with Mengistu, who demanded an exorbitant price for the release of Ethiopia's Jews. The American administration applied heavy pressure on the Ethiopians to agree to the evacuation of the country's Jews, who had been concentrated in a transit encampment close to the Israeli Embassy in Addis Ababa.

Once final approval was given, the planes left Israel for Ethiopia. The operation ended on May 25, 1991. After 35 consecutive hours and four sorties, involving 36 El Al and air force aircraft, Operation Solomon had brought 14,000 Jews to Israel. In its scope, this historic feat has no parallel in Israel's history.

Syria

For years, Mossad operatives rescued individual Jews from Syria and brought them to Israel, via Lebanon, Turkey, Europe and the United States. Many Jewish volunteers, such as Judy Feld Carr of Toronto, helped in the rescue of Syrian Jews. Jews were smuggled out of northern Iraq/Kurdistan to Turkey and then to Israel.

Iran

A major rescue operation involved Iranian Jewry during the Ayatollah Khomeini's overthrow of the shah. In early 1979, Israeli planes flew to Tehran to evacuate the many Israelis in Iran and those local Jews wishing to leave.

Yugoslavia

With the disintegration of Yugoslavia, the evacuation of Jews from Belgrade and Sarajevo, mainly via Budapest, began.

When Sarajevo fell under siege, a complex rescue operation was undertaken by the Jewish Agency and the American Joint Distribution Committee. Several hundred of Sarajevo's Jews were rescued. At first, only children and the aged were evacuated; later, practically the entire Jewish population left the city.

The Former Soviet Union

In recent years, rescue operations have taken place in Central Asia and Caucasus mainly as a result of the dismantling of the Soviet Union. The rescue operations were performed by representatives of the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency against a backdrop of local nationalism combined with anti-Russian sentiments and Muslim fundamentalism.

Some 16,000 Jews lived in Tajikistan – almost half of them Bukharian Jews, the other half European Jews.

The Mujihadin, which was overthrown in Afghanistan, began to cross the border into Tajikistan. Soon afterward the economic situation deteriorated and a bloody civil war broke out. With the worsening conditions of war and the closing of the borders, the Jews of Tajikistan began to leave the country in September 1992 via Russia and Uzbekistan. After much intricate effort, Jewish Agency personnel organized the first flight from Dushanbe to Tel Aviv, carrying 136 immigrants. For a year and half, thousands of Jews left Dushanbe on direct flights to Tel Aviv. Approximately 1,000 Jews stayed behind.

In the summer of 1992, fighting broke out in Avkhasia, on Georgia's northwest border. Through its office in Tbilisi, the Jewish Agency conducted several land and air operations to rescue the 1,200 Jews of Sukhoumy, one of Georgia's major city's. Most of them were evacuated to Tbilisi and from there to

Most of Sukhoumy's Jews preferred to stay until the last moment, namely, the fall of the city, since they hoped to be able to sell their property. Thus, the operation became a rescue of several hundred refugees fleeing the city. Some 900 Jews immigrated to Israel from Sukhoumy during this period.

In late 1991, a military coup took place in the northern autonomous region of Caucasus. Gen. Guhar Dudayev seized power and announced secession from Russia even though the autonomous area had been within Russian territory for more than 100 years. The Russians decided to overthrow the Dudayev regime and in 1993, severe fighting broke out in Chechnya.

Dozens of Jews fled Chechnya for neighboring Dajikistan and Azerbaijan, where they were taken care of by Jewish Agency personnel.

In December 1994, Russian forces invaded Grozny, the Chechnyan capital. The Jewish Agency organized several rescue missions for Jewish refugees fleeing Grozny. Within a short period of time, after a brief stay in the transit camp near Mineralni Vodi and after much hardship, the Jews of Chechnya were brought to Israel.

From a political standpoint, one of the most complex rescue operations from the former Soviet Union carried out by Israeli organizations was in Moldova.

The Pridipastrovia area was annexed to Moldova in 1947. But most of the region's population is Russian and Ukrainian.

In the spring of 1992, a bloody civil war broke out. The local government in Pridipastrovia attempted to sanitize its cities of Moldavian elements. The Moldavian regime, on the other hand, tried to demonstrate its sovereignty there. The region had a Jewish population of more than 10,000, mainly in the cities of Tiraspol and Bendery.

During the fighting, thousands of Jews were evacuated and fled from Tiraspol to Odessa in Ukraine, where they were concentrated in a Jewish Agency-run camp. By contrast, the Jews of Bendery were evacuated to the city of Kishinev in Moldova.

In a complex political operation, the Jews reaching Odessa were transferred to Kishinev, where, together with the Jews of Bendery, they were airlifted to Israel in an operation that lasted several weeks.

Israel's policy of rescue is proof that the lesson of the Holocaust has been learned. Never again will the shedding of Jewish blood remain unchallenged and unavenged.

The IDF at fifty

By STUART A. COHEN

An Israeli soldier plays the guitar while his colleagues sing during their tour of duty in Hebron in the fall of 1997. [RNS/Reuters]

Ever since its establishment in 1948, the modern State of Israel has exhibited characteristics conventionally associated with a "nation in arms." Of the many factors which have justified and reinforced that image, undoubtedly the most salient relates to the structure of Israel's military framework.

The Israel Defence Force (IDF) has never been a predominantly professional institution. Instead, it has always prided itself on its image as a "people's army" in which long-service career soldiers constitute only a small nucleus of the total available complement. Throughout its history, most of the IDF's manpower (and woman-power) has consisted of two other elements. One is the annual cohorts of female and male compulsory conscripts, most of whom are drafted into military service for, respectively, two and three years at age 18. The other – and larger – is the pool of reservists (principally males), who are liable for additional terms of roughly one month's duty every year until middle age.

Over time, this unique "three-tier" system of military service has attained the status of national hallmark, influencing the entire fabric of all Israeli life, private as well as public. Enlistment in the IDF has become the most salient of all rites of passage to citizenship for Jewish Israelis. By the same token, a distinguished service record has become a stepping-stone to advancement in other walks of life. Moreover, and precisely because of its character as a citizen-army, the IDF has also assumed a wide range of quasi-civilian roles, which have far exceeded the nature of its nominal function as an instrument of national defence.

Quite apart from acting as a national "melting pot" in which disparate elements of the population can meet in a common cause, the IDF has also made a massive institutional contribution to several other enterprises of supreme national significance, such as land settlement, immigrant absorption and education. Given this background, to which must be added of course the IDF register of battle honors, it is hardly surprising that, during the first 50 years of statehood, the force was transposed into a national icon. It enjoyed a degree of national prestige and wielded a measure of national influence unmatched in any other western democracy of the contemporary age.

Whether or not the IDF can still sustain that position now constitutes one of the most pressing items on Israel's public agenda. True, and as all public opinion surveys confirm, the force continues to head the list of national institutions in which Israeli citizens place most trust. However, given the relative paucity of alternatives (the Knesset? the rival political party organizations? the Histadrut [labor federation]? the Chief Rabbinate?), that may not be saying very much. Far more significant and far less auspicious are the symptoms indicative of an evaporation in the virtually totemistic aura that once enveloped the force.

The signs that a shift of fundamental proportions is taking place are too blatant to be ignored. Commentators now regularly compare the amount of critical scrutiny which Israel's media currently focuses on IDF operations with the atmosphere of awed deference that permeated most press references to the military just a couple of decades ago. They similarly note the far more stringent stance being adopted by the courts towards military conduct, as well as the incomparably more intrusive attitude being evinced by the present generation of parents, who express increasingly vocal apprehension about both the conditions and the purposes of the military service which their children and spouses are being commanded to perform. Above all, concern is being aroused by evidence that indicates a progressive decline in what military sources term "the motivation to combat duty" amongst the present generation of troops.

Whereas Israelis of all backgrounds were once renowned for the willingness – indeed eagerness – with which they were prepared to assume the burdens of compulsory service, such is no longer the case. The current chief of the IDF General Staff, Lieutenant-General Amnon Shachak, has publicly admitted that "droves" of conscripts now resist enlistment in fighting units. Among reservists, he reported, applications for exemption from duty have assumed "epidemic" proportions. These tendencies seem to be particularly marked amongst the kibbutz population, which in a previous generation provided the IDF with much of its leadership.

Transformations of that magnitude and extent in the IDF's domestic environment cannot be attributed to any one cause. This is especially so since the change itself seems to have been fairly incremental in form and hence not the result of any single circumstance.

After all, the IDF first seems to have swayed on its pedestal of presumed infallibility as long ago as the Yom Kippur War of October 1973, which erupted in circumstances for which a government commission of enquiry (the Agranat Commission) later considered the high command to be principally responsible.

Its image was further dented during the Lebanon War of 1982 to 1985 and the intifadah (1987 to 1993), both of which proved to be embarrassingly protracted campaigns, each studded with evidence of tactical deficiencies and moral lapses at all levels of command. Both, too, gave rise to what were – by all previous Israeli standards – an alarmingly high incidence of conscientious objection, a phenomenon which, in the wake of the 1993 Oslo accords, also threatened to encompass large sections of right-wing and religious opinion.

Significant though it certainly is, the IDF's growing record of operational failings cannot itself fully explain the decline in the domestic status of the force. In retrospect, two further factors seem to have made equally substantial contributions. The first – and in the long term undoubtedly the more significant – may be categorized as "cultural," a term here used to encompass that vast spectrum of beliefs, images and symbols which shape overall public prisms on matters of communal discourse. The second factor is institutional, a rubric which focuses more narrowly on developments within the IDF itself and, still more specifically, on the way in which it has begun to reshape its overall force structure. Although intrinsically related, these two developments warrant independent analysis.

By their nature, cultural shifts are notoriously difficult to define. This is especially true of so heterogeneous a society as Israel, where vastly different world views and ideologies simultaneously appeal to different segments of the population. That said, it is now generally agreed among sociologists that Israel is moving from what they term a predominantly "military" society to one in which "civil" values are becoming increasingly more pronounced. This is another way of saying that in Israel, as elsewhere in the West, the axiomatic centrality once accorded in the collective mind to narrowly defined national security concerns is being replaced by a focus of attention on matters related to social and economic welfare and moral well-being. As a result, not only have public reverence for military agencies decreased and willingness to sustain vast military budgets declined, but more significantly, the knot between good citizenship and military service has also been untied, perhaps irretrievably.

The Middle East peace process, which has inevitably and understandably generated hopes that Israelis can in any case look forward to a more relaxed security posture, has of course contributed to this process (as, for that matter, have the end of the Cold War and the demise of the Soviet threat in the West). But the underlying causes run deeper.

At root, the new status of the military in Israeli society stems from a deep-seated suspicion – particularly pronounced among articulate segments of the secular and suburban bourgeoisie – that the resort to force, and perhaps even a constant preparedness to resort to force, might not constitute the most appropriate means of dealing with the challenges presented by the contemporary world. In this view, the concept of "security" cannot be constricted to the brute calculus of military measures. It must now encompass steps that benefit the moral health and personal rights of each and every citizen. Hence, military service is neither the sole yardstick of citizenship, nor necessarily the most significant gauge of community service.

Changes in the institutional complexion of the IDF itself have added a second, complementary layer to that process. Basically, this is because in the 1990s, the force has itself done much to undermine its own image as a "people's army." Although nominally still committed to the three-tier system of military service established 50 years ago, the IDF has in fact begun to assume a more distinctly "profes-

One expression of that change is to be found in the reduction in the overall burden of reserve duty by as much as 50 percent during the past decade. Another is the increasing proportion of citizens of conscript age who are either being drafted for shorter terms, granted early discharges or excused from service altogether. (The IDF Manpower Branch estimates that by the year 2000 fully one-half of the total number of the country's 18-year-olds will fall into one of those categories.) A third symptom of change can be discerned in the growing number of material and educational incentives being offered to talented junior officers to contract for longer terms of paid service.

Altogether, in fact, the IDF is striving to become what Lieutenant-General Dan Shomron (IDF chief of staff, 1987 to 1991) defined as "a leaner and smarter" force, which places a premium on quality rather than on quantity and is thus best placed to take maximum advantage of the strategic advantages conferred on Israel by virtue of the superior calibre of her troops.

The drive towards the creation of "a leaner and smarter" IDF easily dovetails with the current shift to which reference has already been made. Indeed, it itself represents an expression of the degree to which Israelis feel themselves to be living in a new age. The organizational changes which the IDF is presently orchestrating reflect a growing consciousness among the High Command that what they term "the future battlefield" mandates a far higher standard of technical proficiency, in both combat and support units, than has previously been required.

Given that comparatively few recruits might be likely to attain the necessary levels during their conscript terms, and given that even fewer reservists can be expected to maintain them throughout their military lifetimes, it makes sense to rely on more substantial long-service and professional cadres. Moreover, given that the most sophisticated battle platforms now constitute "force multipliers" of unprecedented effectiveness, the IDF can altogether afford to adopt a more flexible attitude towards military conscription. This can be translated into a policy whereby those whom the IDF seeks to retain in the ranks are offered far more substantial incentives, while those considered superfluous can be released together.

Notwithstanding the significance of the steps thus being taken in order to transform the IDF into a more "professional" army, it still remains an overwhelmingly militia force. For the foreseeable future, that is likely to remain the case. Thus, suggestions that Israel might, for instance, be on the verge of instituting a system of entirely voluntary conscription seem altogether far-fetched. The reasons do not lie solely in Israel's continuing need to maintain the option of a larger force than the volunteer system might be able to provide, nor even in the suspicion that an entirely professional force might (at least in the short term) entail budgetary costs which the country cannot yet meet.

More significant – and more influential – are other considerations. Should compulsory military service be abandoned, what alternative "rite of passage" towards full citizenship will Israel be able to provide for those not enlisted? (One suggestion is the institution of a system of compulsory civic service, such as exists in Germany.) Should all service be voluntary, what will be the sociological complexion of the force? Will women be adequately represented? Will all ethnic groups? Will all political opinions?

The significance of the present situation is not that there are as yet no clear-cut answers to such questions. Far more noteworthy is the fact that, for the first time in 50 years, they are being asked. They have in fact become a vehicle for addressing some of the most fundamental issues affecting the entire national fabric. As Israel enters the sixth decade of her existence, the search for a resolution of the queries thus being addressed seems likely to occupy an increasing portion of her public's attention.

THE 'OLD MAN' AND HIS YOUNG SOLDIERS

Opening the Road of Valor

In the road we open today, there is set the crown of our fight for the homeland and freedom. Into its making went the most tragic heroism and the greatest grandeur of that fight since the day we were called to face our many enemies and to save Jerusalem.

This was the heart and soul of the War of Independence...It was, it still is, a struggle in the eternal city and round about it, and even more a struggle for the road into it. On mastery of this road, hangs the city's fate.

Thus, as April began, our War of Independence swung decisively from defense to attack. "Operation Nachshon" was launched to free the road.

Here, in the Ayalon Valley, the Israel Defence Army, which itself was just starting to take shape, made its first assault on the Arab lines at Latrun. In the van was the Seventh Brigade, newly mobilized, in the main of men landed a few days earlier from the detention camps of Cyprus. Its units in a brave engagement penetrated the village and burned it down, but were forced back by massed artillery.

A Palmach Brigade, with typical courage, renewed the assault but it too had to withdraw, not unscathed.

It seemed as though we had been worsted at Latrun, yet the fighting there in actuality saved Jerusalem, even before the first truce gave it a brief respite, for we had compelled the enemy to shift a large part of his strength from the city to the valley; the shelling was more fitful and the citizens were heartened to hold out until the end.

And more: the fighting gave us a new and open access from the coast through the foothills to Jerusalem. At the end of May, the Eleventh Brigade took Beit Jiz and Beit Susin and the Palmach entered Za'ra, birthplace of Samson. These actions hewed out the line of shock and valor we call the "Burma Road," on the deliverance and the salvation of Jerusalem. Afterwards, it was retraced along an easier and more appropriate line, no longer to be makeshift in emergency but an established and enduring link...to imperishable Jerusalem.

Minorities increasing clout

By GABRIEL BEN-DOR

The reason for the existence of the State of Israel is that it is the State of the Jewish people. Yet a considerable percentage of its citizens – at the time of the 50th anniversary of the State about one in every five – is not Jewish.

The demographic rate at which the non-Jewish population is growing is far faster than that of the Jewish majority, and it is only the large-scale immigration of Jews in several key periods of the modern history of Israel that has kept the large Jewish majority intact. In the future, it is likely that the minorities will constitute a considerably higher proportion of the population, and this fact of life will lead them to have an increasingly vocal role in Israeli society and politics.

Already it is apparent that the Arab population in Israel is a factor in determining the prime minister of the country. In the elections of 1996, Labor leaders cited a low turnout of the Arab voters as the reason for the narrow defeat of their candidate at the hands of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who won by some seven-tenths of a percentage point. The Arab voters were disenchanted with the dovish gestures of then-prime minister Shimon Peres in initiating Operation Grapes of Wrath in Lebanon, and in suspending the peace talks with the Palestinian Authority in the wake of murderous suicide bombing attacks by terrorist organizations based in autonomous Palestinian territories.

The vast majority of the Arab population in Israel is very young, under the age of 18, and as it comes of age, the direct political power of the Arabs will grow dramatically in terms of controlling a very large bloc of seats in the Knesset, as well as in being able to make a critical difference in the direct elections for prime minister.

All this comes at a time when the country is at a virtual stalemate between two huge political blocs. The bloc of the left, with which the vast majority of the Arabs in Israel vote, will benefit from this demographic-political tendency, unless further rifts are created in the alliance or the Arab politicians are able to create authentic Arab parties that try to go it alone in the next few election campaigns.

Above all, the Arab population in Israel is in the midst of rapid social change, a process that is bound to have profound political consequences. The community that used to be overwhelmingly rural is now becoming largely urban. Its level of education is rising dramatically, with the appearance of very large numbers of educated professionals in virtually all walks of life. Its income has already increased to the point where the Arab market in the country has become a major economic force, eagerly courted by a variety of commercial interests.

All this and other developments, have led to greater self-confidence in Arab identification and political attitudes. Arabs in Israel today no longer fear to identify themselves as Palestinians; yet, at the same time, they affirm their absolute commitment to their Israeli citizenship and to their continuing to belong, physically and politically, to the Israeli state. However, they would increasingly like to see the country turn from a Jewish state into "a state of all of its citizens," as the popular contemporary phrase would have it.

So, on the eve of the 50th anniversary of the existence of the State, its large Arab minority is very different in every way from what it was in the early years. When the War of Independence came to an end in 1949, the Arabs in the country were only some 150,000 strong, a far cry from the 1.3 million or so who resided in mandatory Palestine under British rule. From a substantial majority in that old political framework, they became a small minority in a new one which they did not understand and with which they found it difficult to identify, for all its symbols were Jewish, and hence alien to them.

A very large proportion of the population became refugees, some in their own country, others outside it. The fighting decimated their ranks and the vast majority of the leadership fled the country. All major urban centres – which had a huge cultural as well as political significance – were now outside Israel, with the single exception of the city of Nazareth, a city with a Christian majority, while the vast majority of Israeli Arabs are Muslims (around 70 percent).

Thus, in the early years of the State, the Arabs in the country were like sheep with no shepherds. Worse, once it became clear that the war had merely come to a temporary end and that the Arab-Israeli conflict would rage on violently for a long time, the Israeli authorities began to regard the Arab minority as a community of potential danger, as a possible fifth column, and they therefore established a system of military rule over large areas populated by Arab citizens.

This system, which most Israeli Jews considered a necessary security measure, was regarded by most Arabs – and not only by them – as a classic case of ethnic discrimination, subjugating them to the whims of paternalistic and hostile authorities in a regime of flattery, servility and an atmosphere of divide-and-rule.

The distrust between the Israeli security authorities and the Arabs in the country was exemplified in the 1956 massacre of Kfar Kassem, a village near Petah Tikva, when dozens of innocent villagers were shot for failing to observe a curfew of which they were simply ignorant. The ensuing court martial, which ended in light, symbolic sentences, failed to clear the air. This horrible incident continues to poison Jewish-Arab relations in the country to this very day.

In the meantime, the Israeli political parties used a system of patronage and at times almost outright corruption to secure the votes of the Arab citizens. Until the late 1960s, the Arabs were not allowed to be members of the Zionist parties. Instead, most major parties established Arab "satellite lists," which were affiliated with the main party leadership and featured traditional Arab chieftains and tribal leaders as drawing cards. This structure came apart only in the third decade of the existence of the State, while the military government was abolished only a few years earlier.

Each war became a test for the loyalty of Israeli Arabs, who passed these tests easily. There were few signs of disloyalty and Israel's enemies found they could not rely on the support of Israeli Arabs for active anti-Israeli activities, no matter how critical they were of the acts and attitudes of the various Israeli governments.

However, after the 1967 war, the rise of Palestinian consciousness and the increasing popularity of the Palestinian cause around the world led to a dramatic rise in the identification of Israeli Arabs as "Palestinians residing in Israel." Yet they would not think in any substantial numbers about moving to a putative Palestinian state, as every serious survey has demonstrated.

For Israeli Arabs, therefore, the coexistence of Israeli and Palestinian identities has been a fact of life, and they do not fear the possible contradictions that may result. It goes without saying that whenever the peace process goes well and the future of peaceful coexistence between Israel and the Palestinians looks promising, the strains of being Palestinian as well as Israeli decrease, whereas the occasional stalemates and breakdowns in the peace process exacerbate the tensions. So Israeli Arabs are strongly committed to the peace process, not only on ideological grounds, but also because this appears to be in their enlightened self-interest.

This raises the question of rights and duties in the State. In the past, the Jews in Israel by and large considered the Arabs to be part of another people, one that was at war with Israel, so that they could hardly be expected to be totally loyal to Israel. As former Israeli foreign minister Abba Eban put it with his usual brilliance, the tragedy of the Israeli Arab is expressed in the saying, "My people is at war with my country." Under such circumstances, no real trust or equality could be achieved or expected in a country fighting for survival in the midst of numerous enemies.

Israel could survive only by fighting, and for that the Jews in the country have served in the army for long periods of time, sacrificing the best years of their lives and putting at risk their comfort, health and all too often their very lives. This, the most important duty of the Israeli citizen, has not been fulfilled by the Arab minority: Israeli laws of compulsory conscription do not apply to the Arabs. They are collectively exempt, as are other groups, such as religious Jewish women and haredi men who study in yeshivot.

From the point of view of the Israeli Jew, it made no sense to demand equal rights when equal duties were not on the agenda. That alone justified a state of affairs that the Arabs considered discriminatory: not allowing them access to certain sensitive places of employment where they were considered security risks, allocating more expenditures for developing Jewish settlements and developing Jewish communities by channeling to them funds from the Jewish Agency – a non-state institution – from the benefits of which non-Jews have been excluded.

On the whole, Arabs feel that the entire issue of military service is phony. After all, they argue, those Jewish groups that are also exempt are not discriminated against. Also, the minority groups that do serve in the military on a compulsory basis – the Druze and Circassians, some 10 percent of the minorities – and those that serve voluntarily but in significant numbers – the Bedouins – have failed to reach the equality that they hoped for, and their integration into the mainstream of life in the State still leaves a lot to be desired.

Beyond all this, a fair number of Arabs have started to think seriously about accepting such Jewish initiatives as compulsory participation in some form of national service for them, hence creating a fundamental equality in duties and thereby paving the way for equal rights as well.

However, equality is not only a matter of funds or formal legal privileges. The Arabs in Israel are also unhappy about the basic Jewish character of the State, which they feel will always leave them on the margin as virtual outsiders, for they cannot identify with its symbols, flag, anthem and national holidays, which are all taken from the Jewish tradition and geared to the needs and concerns of the Jews. They would like to transform the State into a non-Jewish one, which would express their needs and concerns on an equal footing with those of the Jews. From the point of view of the majority, that would be the end of the idea of the Jewish state, the classic reason for the existence of Israel.

The present challenge for Israel is the demand of the increasingly powerful and vocal minority to bring about this transformation. The alternative is to find some creative strategy that would allow Israel to maintain the Jewish character of the State, while also allowing for the participation of the numerous non-Jews in the country in ways that would express their identity, history and ambitions to the fullest possible extent.

The challenge of the first 50 years of Israel was to secure the very existence of the State and to develop Jewish society, culture and the economy. The challenge of the next generation will be not only to achieve a durable peace, but also to build a society in which Jewishness will be formally as well as substantively compatible with full equality for non-Jews.

Cultural life rich, vibrant

By DAVID B. GREEN

Go to the closest cineplex in Israel and you'll find nine out of 10 moviegoers attending an American film. Enter the nearest branch of Tower Records and the largest number of titles will be of English-language pop discs. Go into a bookstore and find as many bestsellers translated from other languages, more often than not English, as original Hebrew books. Turn on the TV and find three 24-hour cable news stations – in English – and a slew of American series, from Beverly Hills 90210 to Seinfeld to Drew Carey to ER. There's even a new retro trend that has brought I Dream of Jeannie and Bewitched to the small screen here for the first time.

So it's easy to understand the temptation to dismiss the existence of an authentic Israeli culture, to believe that over the period of 50 years, Israel has gone from being a British colony to being an American one, just another outpost of the Wonderful World of McDisney.

This concern is not unique to Israel: It preoccupies the Canadians and the French too, as well as numerous other nationalities. And yet I would argue that when one takes into consideration Israel's short history, its demography and its geography, the richness and vibrancy of the country's homegrown cultural life is nothing short of remarkable.

Any discussion of that cultural life must begin with the renaissance of the Hebrew language. People pay lip service to it, and every city in the country has a street named for Eliezer Ben Yehuda. In Jerusalem, where I live, it's the one around which Burger King, McDonald's, Pizza Hut, KFC, and Dunkin' Donuts are strategically placed.

But Hebrew has so comfortably settled in as the language of workaday Israel that it's easy to take it for granted, like the telephone or computer. Nevertheless, its rebirth as the Jews' national language is no less impressive an accomplishment than the creation of Israel itself.

Amos Oz, arguably the country's most popular writer (both in Hebrew and in translation), has said that the language was reborn, not when Ben Yehuda finished the first volume of his dictionary (when his successors completed the work, it had another 16), but rather the first time a boy told a girl "I love you" in Hebrew. Today, they can also curse and insult one another in it, as well as program computers, fix cars and satirize their government ministers in TV sketches.

Parallel to the development of the formal language, which is overseen by the Hebrew Language Academy, is the growth of a rich slang argot that is making its way out of the nation's poorer classes (as well as drawing on Arabic), and into popular music, literature and films.

It may be true that when Israelis go out to the movies, they're likely to see an American film starring an Austrian-born former body-builder, but it's also true that today they have more original Hebrew-language shows to watch on TV than ever before. Not only are there some half-dozen national radio stations and more than a dozen local ones, but there are estimated to be as many as 170 pirate stations. Nearly all fill the airwaves (at least one even interfering with signals to and from the control tower at Ben-Gurion International Airport) with Hebrew chatter, news and music.

In fact there's enough original Hebrew pop music being recorded each year for there to be a national debate on how air time is being divided between songs by Ashkenazi and Sephardi singers.

And in the mid-'90s, Israelis were publishing some 2,500 new books a year, which per capita put the country in the number 2 place globally – after Iceland.

Writers, like other artists among the country's Jewish population, have generally been "mobilized;" that is, they are Zionists who, even as they may have been questioning policies of the state vis-a-vis the Palestinians, for example, have done so out of a firm commitment to the idea of the rebuilt Jewish home here.

Initially, it wasn't enough to be "for" Israel; literature, poetry, theatre – and historiography – all reflected the "negation" of the Diaspora. Israel, according to this school, was the answer to 2,000 years of powerlessness, to a pitiful Jewish history characterized by humiliation, suffering and slaughter.

For the majority of the early Zionists, "negation" of the Diaspora meant rejecting religion and Yiddish culture and viewing the two millennia of exile principally as a prelude to the recreated Jewish commonwealth in the Land of Israel, populated by a new type of Jew.

Space doesn't allow any real survey of Israeli literature, let alone all the arts, but a glance at the career of writer A.B. Yehoshua (the country's other Mr. Big, after Amos Oz) can give one a good sense of the themes that have preoccupied local writers since the birth of the state.

Most Israelis have defined themselves over the years as either "left" or "right" depending on their approach to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. (After 1967, one's position on the return of the territories became the litmus test.) Writers have to a large extent fallen into the camp of the left, along with most other types of artists. And so, the fiction of the country's great writers, Zionists all, has shown the ambivalence and anguish they have internalized regarding the Palestinians.

In one of Yehoshua's earliest, and most famous stories, Facing the Forests (1968), a university student trying to complete his thesis on the Crusades takes a job as a fire scout in a JNF forest in the north. The forest has been planted on the ruins of an Arab village abandoned in the War of Independence. His only companion is the one man who remains from the village, who cooks for him and apparently is the one who sets the forest on fire. The Jewish watchman gives new meaning to his job title as he watches the trees burn. "He feels happy... The Arab is speaking to him through the fire, he is trying to say everything, and at once. Will he be able to understand?"

Until the '80s, and especially the last decade, Israeli literature and theatre were highly politicized and dominated by men. While someone like Yehoshua may have written novels, their significance was as much in the questions of identity they raised as in the stories they told. In The Lover (1976), an auto mechanic helps his lovesick wife track down her lover, who has gone AWOL from the army in Sinai during the period after the Yom Kippur War; his daughter, in the meantime, begins a relationship with an Israeli Arab boy who works in her father's garage.

In his work, Mr. Mani, published in 1989, Yehoshua was beginning to look beyond Jewish-Arab relations, to the modern history of the Jews and his own Sephardi heritage. The book chronicles, in brilliant reverse chronological order, six generations of the Mani family, shifting back and forth from the Diaspora to Jerusalem, and exploring the vagaries of Jewish life in both places.

By the time he came out with his next novel (Open Heart, 1994), during the short-lived euphoria that followed the signing of the Oslo accords, Yehoshua wrote his first novel concerned with purely personal issues. If his characters symbolized anything, it was the desire of Israelis to lead "normal" lives, and much of the story's action actually takes place in India, a favorite place for young Israelis anxious to escape the pressure cooker of life at home.

Yet, Yehoshua's flirtation with the "personal" was short-lived. Oslo faltered, Israel's prime minister was assassinated by a fellow Jew, and Yehoshua himself, a secular Jew, became involved in study of Jewish texts.

In 1997's Journey to the end of the Millennium (not yet published in English), he journeys back 1,000 years to compare the lives of Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews in the year 999, coming to the conclusion that the latter had a more open, tolerant and cultivated way of living.

While the men were writing political allegories, women crept in and began to write literature ranging from high-brow detective novels to post-modernist, surreal fantasies, with a lot of books about relationships in between. Writers like Batya Gur, Orly Castel-Bloom, Eleonora Lev, Yehudit Katzir, Savyon Liebrecht and dozens of others have scored both literary and commercial successes dealing with a variety of issues that their male counterparts overlooked for decades.

In the theatre, Hanoch Levin is still creating sharp social criticism, but other once highly politicized writers like Joshua Sobol have turned their hands to nostalgic works. (Sobol wrote a lyrical play called Village for the Russian-immigrant Gesher theatre company two years ago, a sort-of Israeli Our Town.) And a certain formulaic type of play has become very successful, in which the playwright takes a well-known political scandal, such as the Jonathan Pollard spying affair, and gives it a dramatic treatment, sometimes, as in the case of Motti Lerner's Pollard, not even

The plastic arts have yielded hundreds of painters (and printmakers) and sculptors, some of whom have gone on to score international successes, such as Avigdor Arikha, Dani Karavan, Menashe Kadishman, Igael Tumarkin, and Israel Hershberg.

Much in the same way that the recession in the international art market in the late '80s and early '90s led to the drying up of funds for art schools and a subsequent emphasis on teaching theory rather than more costly, labor-intensive artistic training, Israel has seen a proliferation of conceptual artists. And sometimes it seems as if there's a critic for every artist. The flowering of figurative art that is taking place in London and New York seems to be delayed here.

In looking at the development of the arts in Israel over the last half-century, one can't help but be struck by a gradual reacquaintance with Jewish tradition. Whether it's a spillover from the growth of the haredi community or a reaction to it, is hard to say. My guess would actually be that secular Jews are drawing closer to Jewish practice and learning in response to a feeling that their disregard for Judaism over the preceding decades has left it open to becoming the exclusive property of Haredim, on the one hand, and the extreme right-wing nationalist religious, on the other. Whatever the case, Jewish themes are making their way into novels and poetry, painting and dance, and even into popular music.

About a decade ago, the U.S. Judaic studies professor, Jacob Neusner, wrote a series of provocative op-ed pieces in the New York Times decrying the defensiveness some Diaspora Jews felt about not living in Israel.

Neusner argued, among other things, that whereas Jews in North America had succeeded in creating art and literature of the top rank (and winning more than their fair share of Nobel prizes in all the sciences and economics), Israel remained a cultural backwater. Israelis may be good at designing tanks or new methods of irrigation, I seem to remember his point being, but their cultural life was second-rate.

Today, Israel is far more multicultural than it was when Neusner wrote his critique. The experiences of the half of the country's Jewish population who are of Sephardi extraction have finally earned their place in the national story and have made their way into fiction and film. Nearly a million Russians came during the same period, and though they tend to lead existences somewhat insulated from the rest of society, their mark is nonetheless being made in almost every aspect of life here, including music, theatre and the plastic arts.

Israel is still agonizing with nearly all the same problems that have plagued it since 1948 (with a few more thrown in), but it is a more mature, open society, and its cultural life reflects that.

David B. Green is the arts and books editor of the Jerusalem Report.

ONCE AGAIN WE ISRAELIS ARE CELEBRATING INDEPENDENCE DAY...
BY FIGHTING FOR OUR INDEPENDENCE..
AND OUR RIGHT TO LIVE WITHIN SECURE AND DEFENSIBLE BORDERS! BUT...
PERSONALLY, I'D PREFER THE TRADITIONAL BARBECUE PICNIC.

HERE IN ISRAEL WE NOW HAVE MICROWAVE OVENS AND CABLE TV

'Be strong, be of good cheer'

Greetings from Mr. Samuel Bronfman, President, Canadian Jewish Congress, after the declaration of the State of Israel.

Sam Bronfman, 1948

With the proclamation of a Jewish State in Palestine there sweeps through Jewry everywhere the electric thrill of pride and jubilee. The age-old dream of 2,000 years is at last realized; a people is reintegrated among the peoples of the earth; the wandering and homeless of an entire generation fast approaches an end.

To Jews in the detention camps and closed ports of Europe the news comes with the impact of tidings of deliverance; to Jews everywhere there is something grand and messianic in this 20th century renewal of the tradition and honor of the past. Surely from all lips there must burst forth today the spontaneous benediction of Shehechianu: Blessed is the Lord who has enjoined us, and hallowed us, and brought us to this day!

This is a day of history. As such it must be removed from the field of the ephemeral considerations and tactics of the moment and viewed under the larger conspectus of time and international action. So viewed, it is seen that the decision for a Jewish State in Palestine is not a unilateral one, not of one country or a group of countries; but the decision of the United Nations in solemn conclave assembled. To that decision, made on the memorable Nov. 29 of last year, there adhered not merely a 51 percent majority, but more than a two-third majority.

I am proud as a Canadian to state that in this decision our own statesmen, the Hon. Louis St. Laurent, the Hon. J.L. Isley, Mr. Lester B. Pearson, Mr. Justice Rand, and the prime minister himself, played most distinguished and effective roles.

Nor shall we, in this moment of gratitude, forget the first of our friends; I am convinced that when in the decades to come the history of the continuing Jewish State shall be written, it will be therein indicated that though the birth of the state took place on May 14, 1948, the seed for its conception was sown on Nov. 2, 1917, when that great British statesman Lord Balfour, first spoke, in the name of the British people, for the conscience of mankind.

To these appreciations we add also our deep-felt thanks for the most recent gesture of the great Republic of the United States, first of the governments of the world to extend official recognition to the State of Israel. Israel will remember.

This is a day of mutual felicitations. The greeting this day from Jew to Jew is the greeting of Geulah. The continuing devotion of the people of Israel to the land of Israel is at last repaid. For the credit of this achievement no one is more responsible than the Yishuv of Palestine, to whom all honor and glory.

Theirs is the courage, theirs the sacrifice, theirs the human agency which accomplished these things; wonderful in our eyes. When the history of the United Nations Organization comes to be recorded, definitely it will have to be stated that its first international decision was implemented, not by the might and power of international armies, but by the zeal and determination of the Palestine Yishuv, made up of farmers and professors, carpenters and doctors, fugitives from the ghettos of yesterday.

To that Yishuv – today the Jewish State — I, as president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, extend the greetings of Canadian Jewry: "Be strong, be strong, and of good cheer." To the moving ideal which brought this day to pass, Canadian Jewry rededicates itself anew, nor will it cease from effort until in the new State, even as in that of Solomon of old, every man again beneath his vine and fig-tree dwells in peace.

CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS IN ISRAEL'S WAR OF INDEPENDENCE AND ON PRE-STATE ALIYAH-BET SHIPS

(From Jan. 1, 1946 to March 10, 1949)

Researched and compiled by
E. KAPLANSKY

Introduction

In those early anxious days of the Jewish State, the IDF obviously had more pressing matters to worry about than keeping records. And in the pre-State period, the underground movements understandably shunned putting anything on paper unless it was absolutely necessary. The same was true of the clandestine recruiting organizations that sprang up in various parts of the world in 1947-48. As a result, not many personnel records from the War of Independence period are to be found today, and only a few identify overseas volunteers as such or specify countries of origin.

With fairly accurate numbers obtainable only for those countries from which the volunteers were few enough for each one of them to know most, or even all, of his compatriots, estimates of the total number of overseas volunteers from all countries were based more on assumption and guesswork than on solid evidence. It is not surprising, therefore, that such estimates varied considerably.

Fairly recent research, some by the undersigned, has yielded relatively reliable numbers, identities, and countries of origin for three categories of overseas volunteer: the killed and missing; air force air crew personnel; and crew on the Aliyah Bet ships that set sail from the United States in 1946-47. Recent estimates, in which the new data was taken into account, are much closer-ranging than previously. For example, while earlier estimates ranged from 2,400 to 5,600 for all countries, it is now widely accepted that their actual number was between 3,000 and 3,500. The aforementioned research has also revealed that they came from no less than 37 different countries.

The numbers I've encountered over the years for Canada ranged from 200 to 1,000. The latter number comes from a well known book I read several years ago that also gives 500 as the number of Americans. Thinking it likely that its author (or his typesetter) had innocently crossed those numbers, I wrote to him suggesting that the reverse was probably closer to the truth. His reply stated, in part, that "these facts have been very carefully checked and I am satisfied that they are correct." That gave impetus to my ongoing efforts to identify all the Canadians.

My excellent starting point in this pursuit was a list compiled by Mike Finegood in the 1980s that included everyone he believed might have been a volunteer from the United States and Canada in the War of Independence era. Finegood, who had been a key recruiter in Western Canada in 1947-48, was planning a book when he compiled the list.

I began by separating the names of those I felt had actually been Canadian volunteers and those that I considered doubtful. This developed, after 17 revisions, into the "authenticated" and "possibles" lists that follow. My list of recruiters and back-up team took shape almost inadvertently, as the information presented itself. The data on the killed and missing comes from the research paper on this subject mentioned earlier.

At this advanced stage of my endeavor, it seems to me that only a few names are still missing from the "authenticated" list, and that most of my "possibles" are actually "impossibles." I therefore believe that Israel's overseas volunteers from Canada numbered 240 at most. I am hopeful that feedback from the circulation of this paper will help me to ultimately arrive at a more precise figure. With this in mind, I would be very pleased to hear from anyone who may spot possible errors or omissions, or who can provide relevant information about any person named in the lists.

The results of my efforts over these past 24 months bolster my earlier impression that few names, if any, are missing from the "authenticated" list of volunteers. Nevertheless, it is my intention to continue working the list of the 36 "possibles" until every name on it is either rejected or authenticated. I would therefore be very pleased to hear from readers who have any information whatsoever on any of the 36 persons named. The information has been updated to Jan. 7, 1998.

Israel's Jubilee 50

Canadian-Israeli diplomacy

By ZACHARIAH KAY

Canada's policy of non-commitment toward a Jewish state prior to 1948 reflected the British-oriented attitude of Liberal prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King, an excessively cautious but masterful politician.

He remained supportive of Britain's mandate policy although there had been vestiges of Christian support for Jewish restoration in the Holy Land coupled with the activities of the Zionist-led Canadian Jewish community. King's caution also accounted for Canada's delay in recognizing Israel following its establishment on May 14, 1948.

King retired in November 1948. He was succeeded by Louis St. Laurent and he, in turn, by Lester B. "Mike" Pearson at External Affairs. Pearson, who was internationally inclined and a United Nations (UN) supporter, had already acquired a high reputation particularly through his conciliatory and mediatory roles seeking solutions to the Palestine question. The kudos he earned were again repeated towards the end of Israel's first decade when he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

On Christmas eve 1948, a month after King left office, Ottawa granted de facto recognition to Israel thereby moving from non-commitment to active diplomatic support for Israel's viability. Still, in relation to the nascent state, Canada never was too far ahead of its British and French allies or outside the sphere of American Middle Eastern policy.

When Israel was finally admitted on May 1, 1949 to the United Nations, Canada conferred full (de jure) recognition upon the Jewish state. That was followed some eight days later by the arrival in Montreal of Avraham Harman as Israel's first consul general.

In September 1953, the Israeli Foreign Ministry's first British Commonwealth head, Michael Comay, was appointed minister plenipotentiary and subsequently ambassador in Ottawa. At the same time Terry MacDermott was named Canada's non-resident ambassador to Israel with the embassy based in Tel Aviv.

Ottawa had supported and worked for the adoption of partition including the internationalization of Jerusalem, but it accepted the Palestinian Conciliation Commission's position recommending the Holy City's division between Israel and Jordan.

Canada advocated maximum local autonomy and protection of the Holy Places pending a final peace settlement. Nonetheless, it neither recognized Israeli sovereignty over west Jerusalem nor Jordanian sovereignty over the eastern part of the city. When Israel proclaimed Jerusalem its capital in December 1949, Canada demurred from any advocacy of internationalization. That did not, however, diminish its support for UN involvement in the area as Canadian Maj.-Gen. E.L.M. Burns became head of the UN Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) in the Middle East.

In the early '50s, the government had been selling a modest amount of defensive weapons to Israel and training aircraft to Egypt. In 1955, a major arms deal of offensive weaponry between Czechoslovakia (on behalf of the Soviet Bloc) and Egypt created an egregious arms imbalance in the region. As a result of this new and alarming regional development, the Liberal government was urged by the Progressive Conservatives and the social democratic Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (CCF forerunner of the NDP) to respond.

Israel applied to the Canadian government to purchase 24 state-of-the art Canadian-built F-86 Sabre jet interceptor fighters. After drawn out consultations and negotiations with the United States and other NATO allies, the St. Laurent government finally approved the sale in September 1956. But with the outbreak of the Sinai-Suez conflict on Oct. 29, the sale was suspended, and never came to fruition.

The St. Laurent government responded negatively to the Anglo-French military involvement in the Israeli military initiative. It also generated heated debate from the Conservatives and the CCF opposition although both were sympathetic to Israel.

The UN convened its first Emergency Special Session of the General Assembly at the beginning of November. Lester Pearson produced a deus ex machina in proposing as a solution to the immediate crisis, the establishment of the first truly international emergency force (UNEF), to be interposed in the Sinai between the warring countries. UNEF's subsequent success as an ad hoc fire brigade, under the direction of Burns, earned Pearson the Nobel Peace Prize.

The federal election in June 1957 brought an end to 22 consecutive years of Liberal rule. The Diefenbaker-led Conservatives were sworn into office. While the new prime minister was known to be pro-British, he had always supported the Jewish homeland and had been a supporter of the proposed Sabre jet sale.

In 1958, under the Diefenbaker government, Margaret Meagher was appointed Canada's first resident ambassador to Israel. While continuing to enhance economic relations between the two countries, the Diefenbaker government also hosted the first official visit by then prime minister David Ben-Gurion in May 1961.

From 1963 to 1968, Pearson led a Liberal minority government. Bi- and multiculturalism were very much on the nation's agenda as was an effort to develop expanded relations with the Third World. The crisis of May 1967, presaging the Six Day War in June, resulted in Ottawa's opposition to Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's closing of the Straits of Tiran and blocking the Gulf of Aqaba to Israeli shipping.

Ottawa criticized both Egypt's actions and secretary general U Thant's subsequent acquiescence in the removal of the UNEF interposed between Egyptian and Israeli forces in the Sinai.

In parliament on June 8, Pearson outlined a six-point peace plan for the situation. It called for a UN presence, freedom of passage through the Straits of Tiran and the Gulf Aqaba, demilitarized zones and an intensified effort to resolve the Arab refugee issue.

Diefenbaker, now the leader of the Opposition, demanded more support for Israel and called upon the government to back Israel's right to Jerusalem, which had just become reunited.

Then External Affairs minister Paul Martin reiterated the points of Pearson's proposed settlement at the UN, adding the need for a special representation of the Secretary General. That eventually led to the passing of Security Council Resolution 242 on Nov. 22, 1967. The impact of the Six Day War overshadowed another milestone in the relationship between the two countries when then president Zalman Shazar made the first state visit by an Israeli, during Canada's centennial at the Universal Expo in Montreal.

In general, the first two decades of Canadian-Israeli relations were influenced by Pearson's internationalism even when he and his party were returned to the benches of the Opposition. Diefenbaker, a longtime supporter of the Zionist cause, basically maintained his predecessor's policies towards Israel.

With the advent of the Pierre Trudeau-led governments and the country's constitutional, bicultural and multicultural soul-searching, Canada began veering from international idealism and started focusing on economic relations.

Through the governments of Joe Clark, then again Trudeau, Brian Mulroney and finally Jean Chrétien, "evenhandedness" – or more accurately, increased attention to Arab sensibilities, was clearly manifested.

Israel began to emerge as a regional power, losing its Occidental underdog appearance. More pro-Arab voices gained the government's ear. Nevertheless, Ottawa's Middle Eastern policy still maintained, and was guided by, traditional Canadian caution.

At the outset of the third decade, the 1968 election produced a Liberal majority under Trudeau's stewardship. The new External Affairs minister Mitchell Sharp inaugurated a general study of Canada's international relations. The study confirmed the already-begun transition from "internationalism" to "even-handedness" on the Middle East. This meant greater cognizance of the Arab states.

One expression of that policy was increased support for Arab refugees. In the 2½ decades ending in 1974, Canada had contributed $32 million toward the refugee situation; an amount which far outstripped that of a combination of many Arab states.

The 1973 Yom Kippur War and the Arab oil embargo affected Canada in spite of its fossil fuel wealth. The Arab boycott of Israel was also felt in the Canadian business community. Ottawa's promise to enact anti-boycott legislation was never fulfilled; although Ontario did enact such a law.

During this time, Canada's diplomatic policies continued to inch towards recognition of Arab Palestinian rights. Canada's stand on the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) at international conferences was ambiguous and controversial. For example, the Habitat conference that was held in Canada included participation by the PLO. But Canada opposed the resolution in the General Assembly equating Zionism with racism. Diefenbaker sponsored a resolution in the House of Commons condemning the General Assembly vote that passed unanimously on Nov. 12, 1975

Prime minister Menachem Begin visited Canada in November 1978, and urged Trudeau to move the Canadian Embassy to Jerusalem.

With the 1979 election, a minority Progressive Conservative government led by Clark came to power. During the election campaign Clark had in fact promised to move the embassy to Jerusalem. The promise immediately produced a great deal of pressure from Arab and Canadian commercial interests opposing the move. Eventually Clark was compelled to rethink his pledge, in spite of counter-pressure from the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

Former federal Conservative leader Robert Stanfield was called upon to re-examine the embassy issue. As expected, his commission recommended that the embassy not be moved.The issue has lain dormant in governmental circles ever since.

The Camp David accords and the subsequent Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty in 1979, won Ottawa's support as did the other ongoing efforts to foster the peace process.

In September 1984, the Progressive Conservatives under Mulroney won an unprecedented majority with Clark becoming the minister of External Affairs. In the wake of the Lebanon war of 1982, the government became more critical of Israeli policy.

At the same time, a report by the Senate's Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs took a more aggressive tone. It supported Canada's contribution to UN peacekeeping forces and to the Multinational Force and Observers in Sinai (MFO); it called for curbing terrorism and violence and for the need to ensure Israel's security. But it also called for a halt of Israeli settlements and for Palestinian representation in the peace process.

The fifth decade in the 50-year relationship began with jarring criticism of Israel. The government appeared to be moving closer to the European Community's position on the Middle East. The break in the traditional attitude occurred on March 10, 1988, in a speech at the annual CIC dinner in Ottawa by Clark in which he was highly critical of Israel.

Clark tried to modify the impact of his acutely negative remarks in a subsequent speech but not very successfully or convincingly.

When Barbara McDougall replaced Clark as minister of External Affairs in 1991, Canada had become an established member of the G-7 and was still enmeshed in constitutional soul-searching. As an outcome of the multinational Madrid peace conference Canada became moderator of the Middle East Refugee Panel.

The federal elections of October 1993, and again of June 1997, brought and kept the Liberals under Chrétien in office along with substantial gains for the Bloc Québécois and the Reform party. "Evenhandedness" was the principle plank of Middle East diplomacy by foreign ministers André Ouellet and Lloyd Axworthy.

Last autumn's crisis over the use of forged Canadian passports by Israeli agents in the Meshal affair led to a temporary recalling of the Canadian ambassador. That reaction by the government was unprecedented in the almost half century relationship between the two countries, but was of insufficient consequence to imperil Canadian-Israeli diplomacy. It did, however, seem to tighten Canada's traditional cautious approach to diplomacy in the region.

Having looked back over five decades of Canada-Israel diplomacy, it might also be meaningful to briefly glance back over what transpired in the 50 years prior to Israel's rebirth.

Henry Wentworth Monk, popularly known as the "Prophet of Ottawa" preached the restoration of Zion and some of his works were read into the Canadian Senate's records. Also read into the record were Sir Wilfrid Laurier's condemnation of pogroms; Sir Robert Borden and Arthur Meighen's support for the Balfour Declaration – prior to and subsequent to its promulgation.

Prime Minister R. B. Bennett's support in a 1934 radio speech for the Keren Hayesod-United Palestine Appeal gave credence to the fact that Canadian Jews were predominantly Zionist. The Liberal and Conservative parties varied in their positions, however, the CCF had as its official policy the establishment of a Jewish state and was in sharp contrast to the right-wing and anti-Semitically-tinged Social Credit party.

Whatever developments loom on the diplomatic horizon of Canadian-Israeli relations is best left to the prophets and not to the pontifications of amateur and professional pundits. Surveyors and analysts will assume their tasks, as I have, in another five decades.

One can safely bet, however, that for a long time to come caution and prudence will still rule in the offices of Canadian decision-makers.

SMILES BELIED FROSTY RELATIONSHIP

The smiles and toasts exchanged between former prime ministers Pierre Trudeau and Menachem Begin during the Israeli leader's 1978 visit to Canada belied a strained relationship. Begin wanted Ottawa to move its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, and Trudeau refused. According to Trudeau's memoirs, Begin "became rather nasty about it," and threatened to tell Canadian voters that Trudeau was not supporting Israel on the matter. "They already know," Trudeau said he replied. "You can tell them what you want, but I don't think it would be very courteous — and I don't think it would be very effective." Not long after, Tory leader Joe Clark pledged to move the embassy, with disastrous results once he assumed power.

The New Jewish State May 14, 1948

By A.M. KLEIN

Conceived 2,000 years ago on that same day the long agony of exile and dispersion began, – throughout the centuries nurtured in the very body and beneath the heart of the people, – borne, through suffering, with patience, – in its own blood sustained, – the Jewish State is at long last about to enter into life.

The ticking of all the clocks of Jewry herald its approach, proclaim its imminence. Unless another Joshua again makes the sun to stand still in Ashkelon, the unaltered circuits of the heavens, the mere passage of time, renders its birth inevitable. The dream of centuries is about to be fulfilled, the dark night breaks, and on the horizon is kindled a new dawn.

For before the Sabbath which approaches will be over, the Jewish State will be a fait accompli, and that neshamah yesairah, that saving additional soul which ever enters with the Sabbath, will this time enter but not pass. As the Friday following the Ides of May – the day when the British mandate legally terminates and the unrevoked resolution of the United Nations touching partition automatically comes into force – as that day is folded back upon the calendar of the past, a new state – yet a state most ancient – rejoins the comity of nations.

It is a theme for rhapsody. How many hopes this theme fulfils, how many frustrations it frustrates, – these are accounts which are kept in records beyond mortal reach, subject to surmisal, not scrutiny.

Clearly one describes only the general contour of the shadows which break – the hideous forms of nightmares which, having haunted the exile, now vanish forever. The Arch of Titus, and all of the suffering it evokes, is now reduced to but masonry and monument; its humiliation and its ordeal are nullified; the Tower of David now overarches the Arch.

The memory of Spain, too, breaks upon the mind, by contrast accentuating the joy of this hour. The bear-dance of the Vistula fades into vagueness; it is the horah which is now the measure.

And all the bitter recollections of the Rhine and the Donau, the ghetto shuffle and the hunched back, the rheum spat upon the Rialto and the stones thrown at Frankfurt-am-Main, the days of sufferance and the nights of flame and horror, all sent vanishing into oblivion, as by a dreamer at last rousing himself from his tossed and tortured bed to look out upon a bright new day, full of birds and sunshine.

Another spectre, too, is laid. It is the spectre, so vividly described by Leo Pinsker, the spectre of a people – our people in European exile – "a ghost among the nations." The prophecy and the exhortation of his book are at last fulfilled: autoemancipation is the day's slogan. The ghost has doffed his ghostliness, and is now in his own land, is clothed with flesh, like a man stands up, and calls his body his own!

But not all the departed, even in the exaltation of this moment, suffer so easy a forgetting. Six million there stand, encircling the Jewish State, silent witnesses to its necessity. In spirit they have issued from the furnaces of Majdanek and Oswiecim, bearing both a message and a reproach: If this had been, we would be! Since this was not, we are not!

That reproach will never be justified again.

For a Jewish State is born, a sovereign body enjoying in its own domain the rights of sovereignty. Jewish history is again – Jewish history; the long hiatus of the exile bridged, the past rushes forward to embrace the future. There stand, therefore, as sponsors of the new Eretz Yisrael more than simply the cabinet about to be announced; all who through the generations labored for Zion, or for Zion sighed, all rejoice in the hour of geulah, and all receive the charter of deliverance, even as all Israel – of all generations – stood before Sinai accepting Torah.

Yet are there some who for their exemplary devotion and outstanding works should in this time of fulfilment be named by name: It is an inspiring roll-call, beginning with Rabbi Zadoc, who for the sake of Jerusalem fasted himself to a shadow; and remembering a millennium later Rabbi Yehuda Halevi, blissfully perished on sacred soil; and the untold paytanim on whose lips the hope of Zion was never silent; and the Chovevei Zion, cherished in their name as in their being; and the incomparable prince, Benyamin Zev Herzl who died 50 years too soon. There are not many states which begin with such cabinets!

A new Jewish State is born. Though it stems from the past, it looks to the future. No one aware of the antecedents and the composition of the Yishuv but must entertain hopes not utterly fantastic for the emergence of a new kind of culture from Eretz Yisrael. Here the West meets the East; here the East has come around full circle. Who will gainsay, that there is in the New Jewish State the possibility for the creation of a way of life which will be an amalgam of the best of the Orient and the best of the Occident – the efficiency of Europe joined to the spirituality of Asia?

Time was when there came out of Zion a light whereby the whole world was illuminated; the fruitfulness and the resource of our people are by no means exhausted; what was may be again. It is a small state? No matter; that other whereof the prophets spoke and the seers saw was not a big state, either.

The proclamation of a Jewish State attests to yet another salvation. It attests to the fact that at long last, Jewry has regained its voice. The plea of Jewry no longer has to be uttered by ventriloquy through agents and intercessors. Granted, as to it there must be granted, a seat in the councils of the world, Jewry may now speak as party and not as petitioner, in its own voice and not through advocates. A nation that was stifled dumb has won back its speech!

It has also won back its stature. No more the gypsy taunt, the nomad jeer! No more the fictitious minority right, nor the farce of "tolerance" which in its own pious name betrays its double standards. And no more the protective coloration of "the helots of the Mosaic persuasion!"

Born also is the New Jew. The hero of the epic is the Yishuv. Only because the Yishuv showed itself as of the fibre of the Maccabees dos the wondrous thing come to pass:

O who is this, rising from the Sharon, bearing a basket of grapes, vaunting the golden apples? And who is he, that other one, following the plough, breaking the soil, as hard as the heart of Pharaoh?

If this be a Jew, where is the crook of his spine; and the quiver of lip, where?

Behold his knees are not callous through kneeling; he is proud, he is erect.

There is in his eyes no fear, in his mind no memory of faggots.

His hump he has left in Ashkenaz; in Sphorad his maimed limb; beyond the seas his terror he has abandoned.

He has said to the sun, Thou art my father that gives me strength; and to the cloud, Thou art my mother suckling me thy milk.

The sign of his father is on his brow, and the breath of his mother renders him fragrant. No legion affrights him, no flame in the dark, no sword in the sun.

For a thousand shall come upon him, and a thousand be carried away.

A son has returned to her that bore him; at her hearth he grows comely; he is goodly to behold.

Behind the bony cage there beats the bird of joy; within the golden cup is wine that overflows.

Meshal affair 'amateurish'

By EITAN RABIN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should appoint an intelligence officer to his staff to advise him on all clandestine operations, the Ciechanover Committee investigating last September's botched assassination attempt on Khaled Meshal has recommended.

In its 100-plus page report, which the premier received Monday, the committee determined that the upper echelons of the Mossad, including its head, Danny Yatom, bear full responsibility for the failed assassination in Amman.

Describing the planning of the assassination – which was Yatom's idea – as "negligent" and "amateurish," the committee slammed all aspects of the affair, from the ground preparations to the fact that the agents who botched the job surrendered too quickly.

The report absolves Netanyahu of responsibility for the failure. Though there is criticism of the premier, it does not relate to the decision-making process or the assassination attempt itself.

The proposed intelligence officer would be the liaison between the prime minister and the intelligence services, primarily the Mossad, so that operations of the type that failed in Jordan could be properly coordinated.

One of the leading candidates for this new post is said to be former OC Intelligence Branch, Maj.-Gen. (res.) Uri Saguy. As reported in the Jerusalem Post last month, Saguy met recently with Netanyahu and discussed this possibility with him.

The committee recommended other changes in the interaction between the Mossad and the prime minister.

With regard to whether Yatom should be dismissed, the committee was split and left it to Netanyahu to

Pluralism in Israel: Canadian rabbis' views

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is very little surprise on the part of the Canadian rabbinate over the rejection by the Chief Rabbinical Council of Israel last week of one of the key proposals by the Ne'eman Committee to establish joint conversion institutes.

Ne'eman proposal rejected
Please see pg. 32

Rabbi Michael Stroh, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, and spiritual leader of Temple Har Zion, called the rejection "most unfortunate."

"The agreements that the Reform and Conservative movements had signed had the potential to create some unity around the question of conversion, which could have been used as a basis for unity in the Diaspora," Rabbi Stroh told The CJN.

"Their [the Chief Rabbinical Council's] out-of-hand rejection and attempts to deal with the realities of Jewish life on the grounds that only they exist, creates a most unhelpful situation," he said.

The Chief Rabbinate, he said, "is sensitive only to the most extreme parts of the Jewish community, and that is too bad."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, said that the Masorti [Conservative] community in Israel and the Diaspora is "deeply disappointed that the Chief Rabbinate has rejected the concerted efforts of all those involved in the Ne'eman Committee to achieve the beginnings of a comprehensive plan for Jewish unity."

Lithuania Lays Charges

WASHINGTON — Aleksandras Lileikis, a former U.S. citizen who fled the country in 1996 rather than appeal a finding he was a war criminal, has been indicted on genocide charges in his native country of Lithuania.

With the charges, Lileikis became the first person charged for World War II war crimes by any of the successor states of the Soviet Union.

Lileikis served as chief of the Lithuanian Security Police (Saugumas) in German-occupied Vilnius province and personally signed orders consigning Jewish men, women and children to death by gunfire at execution pits in the wooded hamlet of Paneriai, outside the city of Vilnius.

Israelis to Visit Pollard

BUTNER, N.C. — In a personal letter delivered to Jonathan Pollard, at the federal prison in Butner, N.C., Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Rafael Eitan signaled his intention to visit Pollard during his next trip to the United States.

Eitan's letter brings to five the number of Israeli government ministers who are expected to make prison visits to Pollard in the upcoming weeks.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations has also sent a letter to the White House urging "immediate" action to free Pollard.

Jewish Restitution

NEW YORK — Poland's deputy prime minister has promised Jewish officials that the new Polish government would press forward on issues of restitution to the Jewish community.

J.B. Salsberg 'a unique personality'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Joseph (J.B.) Salsberg, humanist, labor leader, political activist, politician, CJN columnist, was a man dedicated all his life to Yiddishkeit and to the advancement of social justice. He died Feb. 8 at his home in Toronto at the age of 95.

OBITUARY

"He was a unique personality – very kind and helpful to anyone who needed help, both as an alderman and as an Ontario legislator," said Sam Lipshitz, a friend and colleague who worked with Salsberg for more than 60 years, both in the Jewish community and politically – managing his election campaigns.

"He helped thousands of people. His office was always lined with people who wanted his help, and he responded," Lipshitz said. Despite his own sadness, he added, "We are celebrating the life of such a wonderful man."

The dialogues he wrote in The CJN between himself and his creation, the lovable Uncle Eliezer, are still fondly recalled by CJN readers.

For those who knew him, J.B. exuded a love of life; his expressive, bushy eyebrows and sparkling blue eyes often served as a reflection of his agile, quiet sense of humor.

In 1995, after suffering a serious fall in his apartment, he was asked in an interview with The CJN when he would start writing again. He replied, "When you write, you must take a position. I am no longer so quick to arrive at a yes or no answer. I think this is more mature – perhaps a sign of wisdom."

Born in Lugov, Poland, J.B. immigrated to Canada with his family when he was 11 years old. At 13, he left Landsdowne Public School to help support his family by working as a leather cutter in a purse factory.

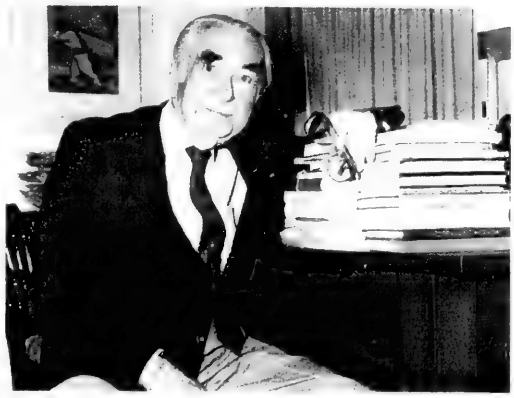
His parents, among the founders of the Eitz Chaim Schools, wanted their son to become a rabbi, but J.B. had other ideas about a career.

Moved by the injustices he observed in the sweatshops of downtown Toronto, J.B. became a leader in the trade union movement. Despite his parents' objections, he was drawn to a life of social activism and began attending meetings of the Young Labor Zionists.

Impressed by the resurgence of Yiddish culture in Russia, the strong feelings he held about equality and equal rights for all mankind led him to join the Communist party of Canada in 1926. Twelve years later, in 1938, he was elected alderman for Ward 4, a position he held until 1943, when he was elected to the Ontario Legislature as the representative for St. Andrews riding under the banner of the Labor Progressive party.

His compassionate nature ensured that constituents flocked to him with every imaginable problem – immigration, jobs, welfare and personal matters.

J.B. was an eloquent spokesperson for anti-discrimination laws. During the premiership of George Drew, he was able to enjoy the rare success of assisting in having legislation passed that banned discrimination in public places – a breakthrough at that time in fighting prejudice in Ontario.



J.B. Salsberg

As a result of the respect and friendship premier Leslie Frost felt for him, a township in the Thunder Bay district was named the Salsberg Township.

In the 1957, J.B. renounced his affiliation with the Communist party. He had heard rumors that rampant murders were being committed in the Soviet Union, that Jewish institutions were being closed and that Jewish life had been suppressed, and he went to Russia

From the editor's desk

Consular affairs

Over the course of the first five weeks of the new year, this space was dedicated to reports on my visit to Israel last December. Those reports ended with the issue of Feb. 5. Last week's column was a special introduction to The CJN's tribute to Israel's 50th anniversary.

From my desk this week I share some desultory thoughts on recent events closer to home.

Rumors from reliable sources were rampant last week that the government of Israel had decided to close its consular offices in Toronto.

In the combined aftermath of the dismantling of the Iron Curtain and the signing of the Oslo accords, diplomatic relations were established or restored with a number of countries around the world, necessitating the opening of an equally large number of new diplomatic missions or trade and interest offices.

But the cost of maintaining so many "stations" around the world has proved too much to bear for the tiny country of 5½ million people. Thus, to save money, the Foreign Ministry devised a list of diplomatic missions that it deemed expendable.

Toronto was on that list.

Can you imagine the impact of such a decision, the message it would have sent to the Jewish community of Toronto, which, combined with outlying areas to the east and to the west, comprises more than half of Canada's Jews?

Thankfully, after a series of urgent, well-placed intercessions by certain individuals intimately familiar with both communities, namely Israel and Toronto, the decision was overturned.

Israel's consular offices in Toronto will not be closed.

We local Jews tend to forget that consular offices also serve Israelis resident in or travelling through the area. Last week I was reminded most poignantly how important that service is.

Two young relatives from Israel, having completed their army duty, were recently vacationing and touring through the United States and Canada by plane and by car, as Israelis so typically do, and they visited our home for one week.

On the very eve of their departure from Toronto back to the United States to resume their travels in Florida – which, in the middle of winter, seemed to make more sense than a northward jaunt into Canada – one of the young travellers lost her Israeli passport.

Upon reflection, she was certain she had lost it in downtown Toronto that day, most likely while riding the subway.

After she had discovered it was gone, we immediately reported the lost, or perhaps stolen, passport to the Israeli consulate.

As the young couple's flight to Florida was early the next morning, we decided to head to the airport anyway, even without the passport, to plead her case with American immigration and entry officials.

At 7 a.m. in Terminal 2 of the airport, our pleas on her behalf fell on deaf ears. In the words of one of the American officials, "No passport, no entry."

Our young Israeli guest was extremely disappointed, even sadly depressed. But as there was nothing more we could do for her at the airport to improve the situation, we returned home. I missed the appropriate exit ramp onto the 401 East along the way, through the distraction of exceedingly glum faces in the rearview mirror.

When I lifted the two suitcases out of the car after we arrived home, they seemed heavier than when they were loaded into it.

But we knew what we had to do. We had to go to the Israeli consulate for new emergency identification. We had to go to the American consulate for a new visa of entry to the United States. We had to arrange with the airlines to replace the old airline ticket, which was now essentially useless. And we had to call the car rental agency in Orlando to alert them that our young guests would not be arriving as scheduled to collect the car for which they had prepaid in Israel.

We sat at the table, exhausted. It was 8 in the morning.

The phone rang. At the other end of the line was the voice of a consular official advising us that the passport had been found. At that moment, the youngsters' depression lifted.

Paul and Elizabeth Waltey, honest Canadians, had found the passport on University Avenue near Dundas Street and had reported the loss to the consulate. Within minutes of the Walteys' phone call, the consulate relayed the information to us.

Thirty minutes later, we were at the Walteys' home, thanking them effusively and gratefully retrieving the document.

Three hours later, our young guests had boarded a new Air Canada flight to a new Florida destination thoughtfully arranged for them by a sensitive, understanding ticket agent.

The mishap of the lost passport could have had far more irritating and far more vacation-ruining consequences. Instead it actually became somewhat of an eye-opener for our young guests, impressed with the honesty of Canadians, the thoughtfulness of an Air Canada airlines ticket agent, who, as a good will gesture, made sure the young Israelis would fly that same day, and with the devotion to duty of the consular officials, who worried about them as if they were family.

So far away from home, in fact, they were.

Barney Danson seeks Holocaust gallery deal

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government has chosen former defence minister Barney Danson to broker a compromise on a Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

Danson says he'll move quickly to quell "ill feelings" that have developed over the affair.

In a CJN interview, the former Trudeau-era cabinet minister echoed sentiments expressed last week by Heritage Minister Sheila Copps, who tried to soothe those upset by the recent debate.

Testifying before the Senate subcommittee on veterans affairs, which has been examining the $12- million expansion of Ottawa's Canadian War Museum, including plans to add a Holocaust gallery, Copps praised the hearings for arriving at a "consensus." She added she's keeping "an open mind" on the whole matter, but that she's hoping Danson will produce specific recommendations.

Danson, a Jewish World War II veteran, has been appointed to the board of directors of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, which oversees the Canadian War Museum, and he'll chair a special advisory committee of the war museum.

And he has definite views on the Holocaust gallery, ones he hopes will mollify both sides.

Veterans' groups have argued against including the Holocaust wing in the war museum, saying the event was not part of Canada's war experience. That view sparked a flurry of heated debate, both public and private – and all of it touching a raw nerve – on whether Canadians generally have an understanding for the unique issues of the Holocaust.

In their submissions to the Senate subcommittee, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) said a free-standing Holocaust museum somewhere in Ottawa would be the ideal solution [CJN, Feb. 12].

Both CJC and BBC said they were never formally consulted about the plans for the gallery.

For their part, the Jewish War Veterans of Canada (JWV) said a Holocaust display should be in the war museum, but that they are willing to compromise with veterans holding the opposite view, and support an independent museum.

Danson called the war museum's current acknowledgment of the Holocaust "pretty Mickey Mouse. It's not much.

"I feel strongly that some element of the Holocaust be mentioned. [The museum] wouldn't be complete without that." But attaching a Holocaust gallery to the Canadian War Museum as "an appendage" would only "diminish" the Holocaust.

So "to do it right," an independent, freestanding Holocaust museum would be the ideal solution, Danson said.

The community has shied away from that, mostly because of the prohibitive costs involved. But Danson said he feels the federal government "is quite prepared" to offer its financial support. "This would have to be a joint effort," he said.

He said there are many excellent sites available in the capital.

While a site is being scouted, Danson said he'd like to see the Canadian Museum of Civilization mount a "major" exhibit on the Holocaust, lasting two to three years.

Despite the acrimony that arose, especially in some testimony before the Senate, Danson feels the end result will be a "win-win. We'll get our Holocaust gallery."

Danson was set to go to work this Monday, when he was to hold the first meeting of the war museum's advisory committee. Following that, he wants to hold more public hearings.

"The Senate committee gave us a good base, but we will go back to those people for further consultation."

Those public hearings will take place in Ottawa and perhaps in Toronto and Montreal, he said. The Senate's recommendations are expected within the coming weeks.

One area Danson won't be examining is how all this developed into such a predicament. Some of the lingering questions which remain are:

- Why was Victor Suthren, the former head of the Canadian War Museum, suddenly removed from his post last fall and given a three-year sabbatical?
- Why did the Museum of Civilization move full steam ahead on the Holocaust gallery, in the face of heated opposition, only to back down later, saying it would explore "an alternative solution"?
- How did the gallery grow in plans from a 2,000-square-foot display honoring Jews in the Canadian armed services, to a 6,000-square-foot exhibit on the Holocaust, for which the Jewish community was asked to raise $2 million?

Danson conceded that plans for the Holocaust wing "were handled badly from the beginning. There was consultation, but it was bad consultation."

Cummer Lodge gets facelift

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 391 residents of Cummer Lodge, about 20 percent of whom are Jewish, can look forward to private or semi-private rooms and en suite bathrooms, instead of the four-bed rooms they now live in.

In fact, on Feb. 9, 108 of them (27 percent) moved into their new digs in a new three-floor wing of the lodge, where the rooms all have sprinklers in case of fire. Each floor has 16 private rooms and 10 semi-private ones.

It's all part of a $45.7-million expansion and improvement of the 28-year-old lodge in North York, to be completed in three more phases by March 31, 2000. The improvements include wider halls and the addition of a fourth elevator in each wing. Total capacity will remain the same and no residents will be left temporarily without a room.

"We have no waiting list for Cummer Lodge now, but with the new units we expect we'll have one soon," said Sandra Peters of Toronto Homes for the Aged, which operates 10 such residences.

The move into the spanking new wing marks the end of Phase 1, which has included the upgrading of the lodge's physical and fire safety facilities so that the concern caused by a fire department tag of "unsafe" no longer applies.

Whether the residents, 70 percent of them women, move into private or semi-private rooms depends on their ability to pay, the cost being $1,800 a month for private and $1,500 for semi-private.

Another 72 residents will move into new quarters when Phase 2 is completed in seven to nine months, but the waiting period is relative.

"For a 95-year-old, even seven months is a long time," said administrator Leah Walters.

The age of residents and their health and lack of mobility is of concern because the average age of residents is now 86; 60 percent of them require wheelchairs, while 70 percent have some mental impairment, figures that are both increasing every year.

As before, Sabbath services for Jewish residents will be held alternate weeks, as will Shacharit services on Wednesdays led by volunteer chaplain Carl Rees.

A total of $35.4 million of the $45.7 million cost is being met equally ($11.8 million each) by the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government, while the balance will be shared in as yet undermined amounts by the province and the new megacity.

Russian faces hospital's bill

TORONTO — The spectre of huge hospital bills she cannot afford hangs over the head of Mila Filatova, a concert pianist.

Filatova's mother, Polia Ilvovski, 83, was admitted to Branson Hospital from Baycrest Day Care Centre with a heart attack, but only after Filatova agreed to sign a document that she would be responsible for a minimum basic charge of $450 a day.

Polia Ilvovski died last Saturday. She was buried Sunday.

Both her parents were rejected as Jewish immigrants because of their medical conditions. Her father has kidney cancer and needs prostate surgery.

They were allowed to remain in Canada for several years for humanitarian reasons on a minister's permit, but they are not eligible for OHIP coverage.

Their case is under appeal to the Health Services Board of Ontario, which has scheduled a March hearing.

But the hospital will await the appeal board's ruling and even if it is negative, they will consider all the circumstances, Fenton said.

"We don't attempt to put anybody into bankruptcy," he said.

He pointed out that recently Branson allowed a woman who had just given birth to stay an extra few days even though she was not covered by OHIP. "She wanted to go home because she couldn't afford to stay, but we thought her health required her to stay longer, despite the fact she couldn't pay."

The Ilvovskis had been treated without charge at the Lawrence Heights Community Centre. Nursing services have been provided at St. Elizabeth Chronic Hospital.

Greater Toronto Area

Illegal Jewish retirement home challenged

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Residents in the Wilmington-Sheppard area are furious that an illegal Jewish retirement home has been allowed to apply for permitted use.

Area residents and ratepayers clashed with supporters of the home at a heated community meeting last week. Critics say the Ahavath Achim retirement home should not only be disallowed from applying for permitted use, it should be shut down altogether.

But residents of the home say it offers quality care and should be allowed to become legal.

Local ward councillors Howard Moscoe and Mike Feldman were raked over the coals for ignoring the problem for years.

The home operates in two adjoining single-family dwellings at 31 and 33 Wilmington Ave. About 25 Jewish seniors live there.

The owner, Joseph Sahar, has applied to the city for amendments to the planning and zoning acts to legalize the home. Technically, city officials say, the home has been operating illegally since it opened in 1992.

Sahar also wants municipal approval to put a small synagogue in the basement of 33 Wilmington.

The home had numerous fire code infractions, but they have all been corrected, officials say.

A few years ago, the City of North York approved the expansion of 33 Wilmington. Residents in the area demanded to know not only why an illegal business was allowed to expand, but why it was permitted to function at all.

City officials Jane Clohecy and Randy Jones explained that the home complied with most local zoning bylaws pertaining to single-family dwellings.

Retirement homes are not regulated in Ontario and do not require a licence, they pointed out.

Surrounding residents complained of congestion, parking and noise, and the fact the home is out of place in a residential neighborhood.

They said legalizing it would trample on the law and embolden others to start businesses in private homes.

Moscoe called it "a wonderful place. I've been through it and I know it's safe. I know the quality of care is good."

But he said his "inclination" is to vote against the home's application "because of the way it was done. I do feel for the people there."

The home's residents and children of residents complained there would be nowhere for the seniors to go, given the long waiting list at Baycrest.

A public meeting was scheduled for Feb. 18 at the former North York City Hall. Public concerns were to be aired, and the 14-member local community council will make a recommendation to city council.

Moscoe and Feldman said that whatever the recommendation is, it would likely be appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board, which can uphold or overrule decisions.

High demagoguery

Judging by the language he used during an address last week at the University of Montreal, Premier Lucien Bouchard fired a fusillade of fury across the bow of the federalists' ship of state in what appears to be a possible run-up to the next provincial election campaign.

Not surprisingly, the first casualty was truth.

Returning again and again to his favorite rhetorical device, the demonization of the federalists, Bouchard constantly invoked impassioned imagery of victimization and exploitation. It was a classic demonstration of high demagoguery.

Ignoring fact and any pretense of reasoned argument, the speech had nothing to do with either defining the issues or clarifying the competing positions. Rather, it had everything to do with breeding resentment and fanning dangerous flames across an already highly-charged field of constitutional confrontation. How else does one explain the extreme language, the brutish imagery and the glaringly false message in the following statement in the premier's remarks as reported in the Globe and Mail? "Using the billions of dollars it has confiscated from us, the Canadian government is attempting to smash Quebec, to belittle it, to overshadow it in every field, to replace it at every opportunity." (Our emphasis)

But the speech was not only intended to anger and to irritate. It was also intended to discredit and to delegitimate two of the core institutions of Canadian democracy: the Constitution and the Supreme Court itself. That was apparent from the following splenetic attack: "It [the federal government] says it will have the last word by virtue of a Constitution that is without democratic foundation and which will be interpreted by a court that it has itself nominated."

Not by accident did Bouchard choose the university's Faculty of Law as his forum from which to attempt to undermine the cornerstones of the foundation of Canada's rule of law. His aim, once again, was to emphasize symbolically his oft-repeated but false dichotomy: Quebec's democratic will versus Canada's "federal imperialism."

Though it strains patience and even taxes faith, demagoguery eventually collapses of its own dissembling weight, and what remains ultimately is the stronger and the higher structure: truth.

Low behavior

The spectacle of Palestinians dancing on rooftops, demonstrating in the streets, burning Israeli and American flags, and clamoring for Saddam Hussein to launch missiles into Tel Aviv is low behavior of the most hateful, callow and brainless kind.

Yet, all last week, such demonstrations erupted throughout the West Bank. The Palestinian Authority (PA) claimed to have prohibited them, but many observers believed the protests were organized with the PA's permission and backing. In either case, whether prohibited or permitted, the implications are distressing and particularly unsettling.

In these circumstances, the spectre of an impotent PA is only marginally less troubling than that of a double-dealing one. Either way, the frenzied, mass demonstrations are an embarrassment to Yasser Arafat who turns to the United States for protection even as his people burn the American flag.

But his embarrassment is less significant than the disappointment and sense of warning felt by Israelis who, hoping that there are Palestinian partners in peace making, shake their heads, once again, in bitter amazement and disbelief.

It is a sentiment we all share.

Don't invite Arafat to Holocaust Museum

Editor's Note: Emil Fackenheim, a former CJN columnist, has asked us to print the following letter:

January 29, 1998

Mr. Miles Lerman, Chairman
The Washington Holocaust Museum
Raoul Wallenberg Place 100
Washington, D.C., 20024

Dear Mr. Lerman:

I must be one of many endorsing Charles Krauthammer's attack on your VIP invitation to the museum extended to Chairman Yasser Arafat. Krauthammer's reason is not that Arafat has yet to make peace with Israel, but that his organization does not hesitate to use anti-Semitic stereotypes and even distortions of the Holocaust.

Arafat is the one man in the world who could stop this obscenity, worldwide. One statement of his, to the effect that the world must respect the Jewish catastrophe for what it was would stop Holocaust distortions in Egypt, Syria, even in Iran and Iraq. And perhaps the German Historikerstreit would never have got started.

This is not a "right-wing" criticism, for I am critical also of a Knesset member for calling Arafat another Hitler. He has forgotten who Hitler was. Arafat has a legitimate quarrel with Jews, Hitler had none.

It is depressing that 50 years after the Holocaust, appointed guardians of the memory are confused about their duty. No government has the right to tell them what their duty is. You should have used this opportunity to say this to your government.

List of Jews against religious tenets

I was appalled when I read about the committee in Israel composing a master list of Jews. The assumption that such an elitist list is needed seems to go against the very tenets of religion. Are we not to be kind to others and treat each other with dignity and respect, regardless of religious beliefs?

A list builds walls and serves only to create a "them" and "us" attitude. It then becomes a chief tool for the alienation of those not part of the "superior" race. Have they learned nothing in 50 years?

UJPO against air attacks on Iraq

An air attack against Iraq, again resulting in high casualties among civilians, will only exacerbate the crisis in the region and further aggravate Israel-Palestinian tensions. Israel has justified fears about SCUD missiles aimed at it from Iraq. But its short and long-term interests require a peaceful solution to the standoff. An air strike against Iraq will increase, not lessen, its security problems.

Defends cancelled lecture series on Israel

Re: story in Eye on Arts (CJN, Feb. 5) on the cancelling of the lecture series on Israel by the Smithsonian Institute.

The issues that the lecture series would have addressed from a variety of viewpoints are vigorously debated in Israel every day. Why not, then, debate them jointly at a prestigious forum such as the Smithsonian? It may interest your readers to know that the Israeli Embassy in Washington had already vouched for the credentials of the New Israel Fund to the Smithsonian before the joint program was even scheduled.

The New Israel Fund should be commended both for its support of human rights, social justice and religious freedom in Israel, and its leadership in open discussion of the issues.

1,200 synagogues burned in Kristallnacht

Permit me to correct an error in The CJN of Nov. 20.

The article by David Lazarus, concerning Kristallnacht, the night of broken glass, Nov. 9, 1938, states that "almost 300 synagogues were set ablaze, with scores of them destroyed."

The definitive number is 1,200. I got this information from Rabbi Gunther Plaut, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

More an exculpation than an admission

By HAILEY TEPPERMAN

Pope John Paul II's admission last October that Christian misreadings of the Bible may have contributed to the anti-Judaism of western Europe, and even Nazi anti-Semitism, is less significant than it first appears.

In conceding that historical misinterpretations of the Christian Bible may have helped numb the sensibilities of 20th-century Christians, who were then more easily influenced by Nazi anti-Semitism, the Pope blamed only certain lay Christians for making these misinterpretations, and not the Catholic Church itself.

By not identifying the Church and its clerics as perpetrators in their own right of biblical misinterpretations, Pope John Paul II effectively exculpated the Catholic hierarchy from the charge of promoting anti-Judaism through the use of its most sacred texts, a charge of which it is surely guilty.

It is clear that the Pope's statement was motivated by a laudable desire to normalize relations between Jews and the Catholic Church. However, if Pope John Paul's logic is followed, Jews should bear no grudge against the official Church itself, since it did nothing to promote anti-Judaism. Instead, any resentment they may have should be directed toward the Christian laity. The implications of the Pope's logic are disturbing. Not only did he clear the official Church of any wrongdoing, but he seems to have had no compunction about passing the buck on to the Christian masses, the very people whom the Church presumes to represent and has sought so desperately in the course of recent years to retain as loyal members.

Certainly, the Christian laity has interpreted certain parts of the gospels in extremely anti-Jewish ways, in particular those parts that have led to the charge against the Jews of deicide. But it would be nonsensical to charge the laity with creating these pernicious interpretations. In the first place, during the period in which the most damaging biblical interpretations were developed (from about 1100 to 1400 CE), most ordinary Christians were not merely unable to read the Bible in their own language, but were prohibited from doing so.

In fact, anybody who read the Bible in a way divergent from that of the official Church was often branded as heretical or carnal. What the Christian masses learned then, and still do now, came primarily through the Church's agents of dissemination: for the most part preachers who incorporated the greater developments in the areas of theology and exegesis (the latter referring to biblical interpretation) into their sermons. If Christian layfolk subsequently believed and spread the information that they had been given, they cannot be held responsible today for creating that information.

The biblical misreadings to which the Pope was referring last October were undoubtedly the ones that characterize the Jews as agents of the devil, and even more important for the history of Jewish-Christian relations, as the knowing and cognizant murderers of Jesus. The characterization of the Jews as diabolical is as old as Christianity itself and was certainly promoted by Church clerics. This becomes evident to anybody – Christian or Jewish, pope or layman – who picks up a history book. The earliest and some of the most eminent Church figures, such as Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom, all read the gospels in such a way as to characterize, not just the Jews of the Bible, but all Jews as filthy and diabolical.

Yet, the biblical misreading that was most detrimental to Jews is the one that inculpated them alone for murdering Jesus. Since about the fourth century, when Christianity was adopted as the state religion of Rome, the goal of Christian exegesis, or interpretation, was to diminish the culpability of the Romans in the matter of Jesus' death by shifting the Romans' guilt and sin onto the Jews.

Undoubtedly, the most damaging exegetical reading that contributed to the realization of this goal was developed by Church clerics in the 12th century (particularly by Peter Alfonsi, Anselm of Laon and Peter Comestor), and came from Matthew's gospel account (21: 33-39). By reading this passage in a certain way, Christian exegetes were able to identify the Jews not simply as the ignorant killers of the messiah (which is how they had been portrayed in Luke's gospel account through Jesus' exculpating words, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do"), but as the knowing murderers of God. This is the deicide charge in its fullest form, and only certain aspects of it were repudiated during Vatican Council II despite the popular conception that the Vatican cleared the Jews entirely of the charge of murdering God and "Christ" (the Greek word for messiah).

In fact, in the Vatican encyclical issued in 1974, the papacy cleared only certain Jews of murdering Jesus, the ignorant masses and the post-crucifixion Jews. The charge that the Jewish priests murdered the messiah and son of God has been retained by the Church to this day.

When Pope John Paul II issued his statement recognizing that certain misreadings of the Bible may have mentally prepared European Christians to embrace the anti-Semitism of the Nazis, he must have been including this particular reading of Matthew, a reading that was acknowledged in the 1960s to lie at the heart of Christian anti-Judaism. Yet, the Pope did not identify this biblical passage outright, nor did he identify any others, since he knew that by doing so he would negate his claim that the Christian laity had created these misreadings. Moreover, by being vague about which passages had been misinterpreted he avoided the far more problematic issue of repudiating what now constitutes Catholic orthodoxy, not to mention the tricky academic argument about what distinguishes "anti-Judaism" from "anti-Semitism."

The admission by Pope John Paul II should not be heralded as a true apology on behalf of the Church, as many writers seem to have done. Recently, Celestine Bohlen argued in the New York Times that the Pope's admission was just the most recent one in a long line of papal apologies and confessions issued by Pope John Paul II. She characterized the Pope as being in the confessional and suggested that Jews were now eagerly listening. Yet, in shifting the blame away from the Church and onto the Christian masses, Pope John Paul II seems, in my eye, to have escaped out the back door of the confessional, rather than remain there as a genuine penitent.

Other writers have also expressed dismay at the Pope's statement, since it did not apologize for the Church's complicity in allowing millions of Jews to be murdered, nor admit that anti-Jewish sentiment existed long before 1933 due to the Church's own anti-Judaism. While these charges are irrefutable, what is most troublesome to me about Pope John Paul's statement is that he deflects the blame from the official Church and places it on the shoulders of lay Christians. This is troublesome for two reasons: First, it creates an escape-hatch through which the Church can exculpate itself not just now but in the future, and at the same time, creates a convenient scapegoat for the Church's own misdeeds; and second, it shows an astonishing disregard for its own practitioners.

If Pope John Paul II wishes to be regarded in the same manner as his predecessor Pope John XXIII, who convened Vatican Council II, he must be willing to admit that the Church had far more to do historically with the creation of anti-Judaism than he now admits. Indeed, acknowledging that one of the Church's fundamental methods of proving the validity of Christianity, i.e. biblical exegesis, inevitably created anti-Jewish sentiment would be a truly courageous act. On the other hand, identifying only the Christian masses as having interpreted the Bible in anti-Jewish ways seems to be an act of weakness, an act that will hopefully not be repeated in the near future, when Pope John Paul II makes a more official statement about the Church and the development of anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism.

Hailey Tepperman is in the final stages of preparing her doctoral dissertation at the University of Cambridge. She spent this last year as an award-holder at the British School at Rome, conducting research at the Vatican on Jewish-Christian relations. Her PhD thesis is entitled The Image and Function of the Jews in the Christian Passion Narrative.

Testimony to Judaism

The history of the Jews in Cape Breton was recently covered in the CBC documentary, Minyan on the Mira. But such a history is better understood from individual accounts.

By Viva Press in Halifax

Through their personal anecdotes, David Ein and Marty Chernin gave more meaning to the now declining Jewish communities of Cape Breton, once-thriving communities. There were four synagogues on this small island on Canada's east coast where only two shuls now remain in use.

During the second weekend in February, I went with the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation (APJSF) to Cape Breton for our annual winter convention. This year's theme, Jews of Cape Breton, couldn't have been more timely.

Ein described his cheder classes, his Jewish upbringing and a recent trip to Israel where he and Paula found the grave of his great-grandfather. He reminisced about the once almost all Jewish-owned shops that used to line Glace Bay's main street, where only his clothing store remains.

He proudly told us about his community's Shabbat minyan, which is formed every week, despite there being only 13 men from whom to choose. When Ein called this a "testimony to Judaism," he was right. It is.

Unfortunately, we did not have the chance to visit Glace Bay. However, the 38 of us made our way through the winding and bumpy roads of the Cabot Trail from Ingonish to Sydney on Sunday morning before our return to Halifax.

When we got to the Conservative Temple Sons of Israel in Sydney, Chernin and a few other members of the community had unnecessarily – although it was appreciated – laid out a delicious kiddush for us. Chernin then gave us a tour of the shul and told us a little about his community: There are only 57 families left, including widows and singles; and the last bar mitzvah is to take place some time this year.

On the walls at the entrance of the shul are big posters of scenes from Jerusalem and Israel. It's not surprising then that the funds raised for Israel by Cape Bretoners represent the highest per capita rate in Canada. They may be a small community, but their love for Israel and Yiddishkeit – as we heard from Chernin and Ein – is enormous.

Before we headed back to Halifax, Chernin took us to the Hebrew cemetery.

The Jewish community may have declined over the years in Cape Breton, but as Ein and Chernin explained, that community is still alive and strong in its commitment to Judaism and Israel. Also, there is a Cape Breton Jewish Club in Toronto that meets to reminisce about old times.

60 Minutes in Quebec

Once again, the province of Quebec has made international news. This time, however, the news revolved around a different type of storm – other than ice that is.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

What I am referring to is the recent 60 Minutes television show report focusing on the language crisis in Quebec. A report of this nature was bound to strike a chord amongst Quebecers of every conviction, and no doubt it did.

The open-minded viewer would probably say that the report produced both positive and negative results.

Let us first examine the positive. Ever since I was young I can remember travelling to California to visit my family. While I was there, I always encountered one ignoramus who would say something like: "Oh, you're from Canada, do you live in an Igloo?" Well the positive ramification of the recent TV show is that I think this misconception of Quebec and Canada was finally cleared up. That's about all I have for the positive side.

The negative effects of the report manifest themselves in various degrees.

Amongst my posse, the sentiment could be summed-up in one word – embarrassment. This feeling is nurtured by the realization that the province and its residents will now be seen by the international community in a very strange light, a light generated by the fact that we live in a region where we arm a police force with measuring tapes, in order to ensure that all the letters and words of one language of origin are kept to a size that is half of another.

One could say that this feeling of embarrassment stems from the absurd nature of our reality in Quebec. In high school, we once studied a French play called The Bald Soprano by playwright Eugene Ionesco, who was in the forefront of the theatre of the absurd. I remember laughing at the ridiculous manner in which the play defied every established norm. At the time, I was impressed with the author's ability to put himself in a frame of mind where he could actually create such entertainment from pure nonsense. Now I feel as if I am in the play.

The language crisis in Quebec has become such an absurd issue that it has become quite a feat to debate it on an intellectual level.

In the present situation, where fines are being slapped for ill-sized English words and questions on referendum ballots are phrased in a manner that scores of people can't even comprehend, a genuine exchange of beliefs is hard to come by. Although there is a realization that legitimate and rational arguments exist, they are buried so deeply that the only thing emanating from this crisis is a continuous fury of fuss over useless details and vengeful rhetoric.

I believe that students today are truly sick and tired of hearing about the language debate. Unfortunately, too much energy is wasted on arguing over the size and nature of the tools used for communication. Instead, this energy should be invested into formulating arguments through communication.

I feel that it is time to debate the real issues and resolve them once and for all, as opposed to continuing on this ride of frustration that is imposed by the absurd surrounding circumstances.

Contrary to much popular belief, there are many anglophone students in Montreal who really love their city despite the annoying political environment. These students do not foresee themselves picking up and abandoning Quebec, unless they feel they have no other choice.

As of now there is a growing feeling among non-French Canadians that they are not welcome in Quebec. This is why the story that was captured on 60 Minutes is so painfully embarrassing to so many students. It must be noted that this is not a political attack, but a simple assessment of honest and irrefutable feelings.

Considering that this issue dates back to the days of a brawl on the Plains of Abraham, many of the important historical developments could not be captured in 60 minutes. However, the absurdity in its purest and most truthful form shone through like an incredible Ionesco play. Unless the director cuts out this absurdity, the curtain will never fall.

At the time this article appears, the Clinton affair may still be in the news, or mercifully, have run its course. Like everyone else, I was for weeks exposed to allegations taken as fact, and the president ended the latest chapter of his alleged bedroom tale by reasserting that he didn't do it. The media were taken to task for their relentless pursuit, and the surveys showed the American people didn't care much one way or the other, as long as the economy was in good shape. Morality seemed to be taking a beating in the process, both from the accusers and the defenders; the media overstepped the bounds of decency and the public lapped it up.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Meanwhile there was a lawsuit pending and another likely to erupt, and everyone wondered what this or that party would have to say if and when the "if" was proven true or false, or maybe both. And in the corridors they whispered "impeachment."

It was also a time when anti-Semites everywhere were a happy lot. Look at what the Jews are doing to the world, they exclaimed with slobbering glee, the Elders of Zion hiding in the garments of the Israeli secret service, the Mossad.

How so? Easy! President Bill Clinton, so the tale went, was putting pressure on Israel to give the Palestinian Authority what it wants, or at least most of it, and so Israel planned to bring down the president by loosing a Jewish girl on him who with her wiles would undermine his presidency and weaken America, with all the attending profits that could be made if the stock market went either up or down, or both.

Fantasy? A nechtigen tog. Look at Egyptian newspapers that have been full of "proof" that princess Di and her boyfriend Dodi were done in by the Mossad. Why? Because, so the story went, the princess was to marry him, and thus the stepfather of the future king of England would be a Muslim, and to make matters more interesting, the princess was said to have contemplated converting to Islam – and the Jews didn't like any of it.

Along the same lines, that proven promoter of peace, the widely admired Saddam the Great, is said to consider Madeline Albright a crypto-Jew, a Marrano – oustside a Christian, but inside a Jew (and naturally, an ally if not an agent of the Mossad). And there is Dennis Ross, who makes sure that the peace process fails – why else would the U.S. president pick a Jew to fake an interest in settling the old quarrel twixt Arabs and Israelis? It all fits, even if it's inherently contradictory – and I haven't said anything about William Cohen, secretary of defence, who wants to win his spurs as secretary of war. I'm sure that by now you get the idea.

The American militia movement, too, has fish to fry. Its members think the government in Washington is staging the Iraqi crisis not only because it wants to divert attention from Clinton's troubles with the starry-eyed counsel who's after his hide, but more importantly because in a war he can invoke martial law and maybe do away with the American Constitution or, anyway, with the militia faithful.

All of which brings to mind the saying in the Pirkei Avot, "The more flesh the more worms."

Israel's booming arms industry

By Sheldon Kirshner

The juxtaposition was telling. As the recent Islamic Conference in Iran was busily denouncing Israel as a "terrorist state," Israeli Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai was busy signing lucrative arms deals with Turkey and consolidating Israel's unofficial alliance with that pivotal Muslim nation.

In the past two years, as never before, Turkey has turned to Israel's defence industry for its military needs. Israel is upgrading Turkey's fleet of F-4 Phantom and F-5 jets, and both countries will jointly produce an Israeli long-range missile called the Popeye. Israel is also trying to interest Turkey in the Merkava tank and unmanned reconnaissance aircraft (drones).

Turkey is just one of many nations which now look to Israel as a supplier of advanced military equipment and munitions. Indeed, Israel's arms industry has evolved into the world's fifth largest, behind the United States, Britain, France and Russia.

In 1996, Israel racked up foreign sales of $1.3. billion (US). Customers ranged from the United States, Britain and Brazil to Singapore, Guatemala and Latvia.

In recent years, several Arab states, whose identities remain secret, have bought Israeli electronic equipment for use in combatting terrorism. During the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War, Israel sold weapons to Iran (whose leaders oppose its existence).

Israel's defence industry, spearheaded by Israel Aircraft Industries, Tadiran, Rafael, Soltam and Israel Military Industries, has grown from a producer of small arms and light armor to a manufacturer of major weapon systems.

Products run the gamut from the Uzi submachine-gun and the Galil assault rifle to the Ofek surveillance satellite and the Python air-to-air missile.

In addition, as in Turkey's case, Israel is noted for its upgrade packages. Late last year, Israel won a $650-million contract to upgrade Poland's Huzar helicopter. In 1994 and 1995, Israel signed deals with the Czech Republic, India and Romania to upgrade their respective fleets of L-39 trainer aircraft and MIG-21 fighters.

Switzerland has bought pilotless spy planes, while Britain – which lifted an arms embargo against Israel in 1995 – has purchased 155-millimetre artillery shells. In South America, Ecuador has acquired Kfir jets.

China and the United States are two of Israel's most important markets.

Armed Forces Journal and Jane's Defence Weekly report that China has bought from $1 billion to $3 billion worth of supplies since the early 1980s, from anti-tank missiles and tank cannons to communications equipment and night vision scopes. The China market was almost single-handedly developed by the late Shaul Eisenberg, a Holocaust survivor who lived in Japan before immigrating to Israel.

The United States, Israel's chief ally, has purchased missile surveillance technology, drones and a variety of upgrade packages for its air force. As well, Israel and the United States are in the throes of developing the Arrow, an anti-missile system expected to come on stream early in the next millennium.

Throughout its existence, the defence industry has been the motor driving Israel's technological development and industrialization. It has enabled Israel to maintain a qualitative military edge over its enemies. It has made Israel into the most technically advanced country in the Middle East. It has been a vital source of employment for skilled immigrants.

Military industrialization was given an impetus by France's arms embargo, imposed by Charles de Gaulle during the 1967 Six Day War. Forbidden to take delivery of 50 jet fighters it had paid for, Israel began to develop a jet modelled closely on the Mirage.

From this ferment the Kfir emerged. The Lavi, a more sophisticated version of the Kfir, went into production in the 1980s. Due to spiralling costs, the project was cancelled. It is still the only real setback suffered by Israel's defence industry since the advent of statehood.

In the newspaper business, you are occasionally lucky enough to run into an unforgettable character. Joe Salsberg, who died in Toronto recently at the ripe old age of 95, was such a person. He was a man of many parts – community worker, public speaker, Yiddishist, insurance salesman, politician, trade unionist, ideologue and newspaper columnist. And he performed all these functions with consummate style and distinction, and a wonderful sense of joie de vivre.

I knew him from his work at The Canadian Jewish News. Unless he was ill or otherwise indisposed, Salsberg, or his alter ego, Uncle Eliezer, produced a weekly column for the paper, and they continued doing so until the early 1990s. Salsberg went back a long way. He was writing the column when I joined the paper in 1974. He had no particular mandate, and wrote what was on his mind and what pleased his fancy. Few writers were given such leeway.

The column was enormously popular, judging by his personal mail and readers' surveys. It might be about the current situation in Israel. Or about the peculiarities of wintering in Florida. Or about the joys of herring. Or about a favorite charity. Or about this or that rabbinical dynasty. Or about the dangers of religious intolerance. Or about his encounters with politically prominent individuals in Canada, Israel or the former Soviet Union.

He regarded his column as a labor of love, and agonized over each one. I know, because he would sometimes bound into the office and compose the piece on a battered old Underwood typewriter, pecking away at the keys with two fingers until it was finally finished. Even so, he would laboriously pore over it, crossing out this word or rephrasing that sentence or paragraph. Then he would submit the column to the editor, and engage him or her in long, chatty conversations.

J.B., as he was universally known, was one of the last great conversationalists. He had a wide-ranging mind, he was erudite and wise, he thrived on ideas, he loved words, and he possessed a wry sense of humor. More often than not, he radiated rosy good health and confidence, was immaculately groomed and was a natty dresser.

When I asked him why he had not written his memoirs, he turned evasive and retreated into uncharacteristic silence. It will remain a mystery why he never fleshed out his rich storehouse of reminiscences. But if he had put pen to paper, I am reasonably sure that his book would have been a page-turner.

Goodbye, J.B.

I also bid adieu to Chaim Bermant, who died in London last month. He was 68.

Bermant, an economist by training, was an author and columnist. I never read any of his books (Jericho Sleep Alone and The Cousinhood, among others), so I will not pass judgment on this facet of his career. But I always turned to his column, On the other hand, in the Jewish Chronicle, the unofficial organ of British Jewry. I was rarely disappointed by the quality of his writing or the breadth of his humanity.

An Orthodox Jew who embraced secular learning, Bermant, in print, was no shrinking violet. He let the chips fall where they might. As William Frankel, the editor from 1958 to 1977, put it: "He punctured pretentiousness, ridiculed pomposity, excoriated prejudice."

Bermant, a self-styled Litvak, was at heart a non-conformist and iconoclast. An exemplar of Jewish tradition, he was an opponent of fanaticism. A lover of Zion, he was a foe of extremism and messianism.

He was uncommonly courageous and a credit to the practice of Anglo-Jewish journalism. We will not see his kind any time soon.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

A literary achievement

Max* by Harry Pollock (Mosaic Press, $16.95, paper)

Harry Pollock's well received first novel, Gabriel, recounted the adventure of a youth coming of age in Toronto during the turbulent '30s and '40s. It was outspoken and evocative, a splendidly realized depiction of both time and place.

Gabriel, now older and somewhat wiser, is the narrator of Max, a many-sided entertaining chronicle that covers the years 1940 to 1970. The author is as filled with information as a ripe seeded pomegranate. He instructs the reader – among other things – about the world of modern art, the life of Samuel Johnson, the haunts of Greenwich Village, the intricacies of women's fashions, the pitfalls of advertising, the literary genius of James Joyce, the problems of censorship, the uniqueness of Irish theatre, Shakespeare's Stratford-on-Avon, the rise of Chassidism, the round table at New York's Algonquin Hotel and the mysteries of the flea circus.

Max Rubenstein of the book's title is a picaresque character, son of a Montreal cantor. Aircraftsman in the RCAF, dissolute and ingenious, he returns ultimately to Judaism as a Lubavitch Chassid. The other characters in the episodic, constantly shifting narrative that includes events in London, Toronto, Montreal and Dublin, tend toward the flamboyant and extreme. But they serve effectively as targets or mouthpieces for Pollock's astringent look at modern society and for his mordant humor.

In Dublin, Gabriel muses, "At the old Abbey Theatre there used to be performances by Jewish troupes of operas like Shuylamith and Bar Kochba. I remember Daddy telling me about a production directed by the Reverend Simon Steinberg, the baal tfillah of the Lombard Street synagogue. Die Zauberin, it was called. In the 1770s, a Jewish violinist, Thomas Pinto, conducted the Smock Alley Theatre Orchestra."

Dinner at the sumptuous Forum of the Twelve Ceasars, Manhattan's newest dining establishment leads Max to this gastronomic eruption: "they will dine on oysters, crabmeat, shrimp, pate, mushrooms and truffles. Sumptuous meat dishes. Fowl, wild and domestic baked in clay under fiery ashes. Venison and hare. Pleasure of the Imperial Table. Favorites of the Augustan Court. The Relish of the Gods. The Noblest Caesar (salad) of the Them All. As Epilogue the Fruit Cornucopia, the Cheeses of Europe, Sweetmeats and Ice Cream, Frivolities Aflame. Coffee: Diabolos, Expressus and Bacchus."

New York's West 47th Street is a singular place where "the store windows display rainbows of diamonds on black velvet cloths and the traders haggle in a variety of languages, exchanging packets of gems worth hundreds of thousands of dollars by verbal agreement, sealing the deal with the seller's cry Mazel and the buyers response Mazel and Brucha, luck and blessing. They gather on the streets, the wide-brim hatted, black-coated chassidic Jews from Crown Heights, their beards and forelocks untrimmed in obedience the injunctions of Leviticus. They babble in Yiddish, these survivors of the Holocaust, holding the stones to the light just as in the Middle Ages when there were over a hundred Jewish diamond cutters in the city."

Pollock, poet, journalist, playwright, president of the James Joyce Society of Canada, has taught courses in creative writing for the past 25 years at York University. His style, lean and muscular, avoids unnecessary adjectives. In a recent conversation with me he indicated that his literary master is Gustave Flaubert, and there are also unmistakable echoes of Joyce.

Some readers may be turned off by irreverent material that sometimes slithers into the salacious. But Max is a considerable literary achievement for seasoned readers to discover and relish.

Comparative Law

Karla's 'repentance'

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

The execution of Karla Faye Tucker polarized public opinion around the world. Tucker, a former prostitute and drug addict, murdered two people in 1983 with a pickaxe.

In prison, Tucker became a born again Christian, got her high school equivalency diploma and eventually married the prison chaplain.

Because of her dramatic transformation on death row, many, including supporters of the death penalty, called for her sentence to be commuted. After all her appeals were rejected, Tucker was executed by lethal injection. Her execution raises a difficult question: Should a criminal who repents be executed for her crimes?

Both the Bible and the Talmud are clear that repentance changes Divine judgment. The prophet Ezekiel writes: "But if the wicked will turn from all the sins which he has committed, and keep all my statutes…he shall surely live, and shall not die…Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? says the Lord, God; and not rather that he should return from his ways and live?" (18:21-23)

The Talmud (Kiddushin 40b) says that when a person repents, all previous sins are forgotten by God. Repentance has the ability to erase one's sins before God.

While repentance can reverse divine judgment, it has less influence on human judgment. There are instances where penalties are changed or waived in order to facilitate repentance (Baba Kamma 66b; Rambam Gezielah 1:13). However, the Talmud (Makkot 13b) states that a criminal guilty of a capital crime is put to death, even if they have repented.

Considering that in the Divine court, a repentant person "shall surely live, and shall not die," why don't human courts follow God's example and grant clemency to repentant criminals?

Four answers are given to this question. Some say (Maharal, Derech Chaim chapter 4) that there is a fundamental distinction between Divine justice and mundane, human justice. Divine justice is based on a person's relationship with God. If a person has repaired his relationship with God through repentance, then he will be forgiven by God for his sins. In human courts, justice is based solely on past actions; therefore, no amount of repentance can change what has already been done.

Another answer (Abrabanel Exodus 7:3) focuses on a deficiency in the murderer's repentance. Repentance for sins between man and his fellow man is not complete until the person wronged has forgiven the criminal for his sin (Yoma 85b). In a case of murder, it is impossible to do complete repentance, because it is impossible to receive forgiveness from the victim; the forgiveness of the victim's family is not enough.

Others argue (Nodah BeYehuda OC I:35) that if we would allow repentant killers to avoid the death penalty, then everyone on death row would repent and the death penalty would never be used. Without the death penalty, there would be less to deter future murders.

Another answer given (cited in Hegyonei Halacha, page 147) is that it is impossible to know whether the criminal has sincerely repented. The criminal has good reason to fake repentance in order to avoid being executed. It is impossible for another person to know if the murderer is a genuine penitent, or is just afraid of execution. Only God knows what is in a person's heart, and therefore only God can accept repentance.

In the Jewish court system, the death penalty was exceedingly rare (Makkot 7a). However, when someone was sentenced to death, they would not be freed if they repented. Because of concerns about deterring other criminals and because of questions about the sincerity, thoroughness and relevance of the criminal's repentance, human courts cannot block an execution because of repentance. However, in God's eyes, one who repents is as if she has gotten a "new heart and new spirit" (Ezekiel 18:31) and started a new life.

Family organization turns 70

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Magazine readers who notice bylines and mastheads are sure to be familiar with the names of Robert Fulford and Bonnie Horowitz Fuller, and may even have come across the names Bill Gladstone and yours truly (Ze'ev Glicenstein) from time to time.

All of these people are members of the journalistic profession – and all are related through a remarkable Toronto-based Jewish family tree.

Robert Fulford, of course, is the legendary Canadian writer-critic and former editor of Saturday Night magazine. In recent years, Bonnie Horowitz Fuller has become celebrated as the editor of the American women's magazine Cosmopolitan. Both Gladstone and I are known for our frequent contributions to The CJN and other publications.

All of us are connected, by blood or by marriage, to the remarkable Rubinoff-Naftolin family tree whose Belarussian roots first took hold in the Canadian soil of Kingston, Toronto and Windsor between 1905 and 1908. Since then, this remarkable mishpachah has grown steadily, generation by generation. Today, by one estimate, the Rubinoff-Naftolin cousinhood accounts for 0.5 to one percent of the roughly 175,000 Jewish residents of the Toronto area.

The multiple branches of this enormous family are all linked through Mr. & Mrs. Rubinovitch, a couple who were in Zhlobin, Belarus about 1830, and who raised at least five children: Benjamin, Minya, Riva Reshe, Rachel and Aaron. The name Rubinovitch was shortened to Rubinoff when their descendants began arriving en masse in Toronto in the first decade of this century.

Having escaped the pogroms of their native country, the newcomers learned new trades and started new businesses: they became grocers, bakers, tinsmiths, tailors, barbers, hatters, plumbers, junkyard dealers and proprietors of department, clothing and other stores. Many lived within walking distance of each other, on streets like Fenning, Shaw, Ossington, Tecumseh, Niagara, Queen and Dundas.

Others lived in the then-Jewish neighborhood in west Toronto known as the Junction. They stuck together instinctively as a means of survival; many cousins intermarried, especially into the Naftolin family. In March 1928 they established Agudas Hamispoche, the United Family Organization, as a means of preventing the various branches from growing apart.

The Agudas Hamispoche established a loan society in 1929 to help relatives in financial distress, a gmilat chesed (benevolent society) came in 1933. Its ladies auxiliary raised money for charity through teas, rummage sales and other events.

From 1948, the organization took over a hall (801 College St.) where many social affairs and Sunday morning breakfasts were held. In 1969, it moved uptown into a building at Wilson and Bathurst, which it sold in 1982. A large charitable trust fund was established with the proceeds.

Today as many as 60 cousins still meet over monthly breakfasts, but unfortunately the post-war generations do not have the enthusiasm of their elders for the family organization. Still, its executives are planning a gala banquet for the summer to mark its 70th anniversary. As with the 60th and 65th anniversary celebrations, hundreds of people are expected.

According to Stephen Speisman, archivist for the Ontario region of the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Agudas Hamispoche was the only family-based landmanshaft-type organization established in Toronto.

Much genealogical research has been done on the family tree in recent years, and branches have been discovered in St. Petersburg, Riga, Ukraine, Buenos Aires, New York, Vancouver, California, Germany, Korea and Israel. For further information, e-mail [bstone@pathcom.com].

First Jewish Web/Net Week

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began looking at the plans for the first Jewish Web/Net Week [http://www.jww.org/] being held Feb. 22 to 27 – right on a computer near you.

Today, I'll preview some of the more interesting sites.

Normally, I only mention a site after I have had a chance to visit it and take a look around for myself. Since some sites won't be on line until next week, I am partly relying on the material supplied by the organizers. Also, keep in mind that as with any kind of festival, there are bound to be some no-shows.

Start off at Channels of Interest [http://www.jww.org/channels.html] where you'll find links to such areas as Career and Business, Communities, Connect with Others, Global News, Israel at 50 and Social Action. Also, don't miss the links to the Live Programming and Live Chat areas that will be carrying music, lectures and more during the week.

For example at the Jewish Theological Seminary [http://www.jtsa.edu/jww/], you'll be able to chat with Dr. Neil Gillman about his book The Death of Death, and chat with Dr. Steven Brown on Choosing a Jewish School.

Much of the week's activities are dedicated to Jewish learning. Teachers and other educators may be especially interested in special Jewish Web/Net Week activities being prepared by JESNA: Jewish Education Service of North America [http://www.jesna.org/jwnw.html]. Learn how to twin your Jewish school [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il]. Are you looking for help getting your school connected to the Internet? Go to CDROMMU's virtual staff room [http://www.cdrommu.org/SimplerNews/get/forumteacher/disc.html] Are you proud of your school's Web site? Tell JESNA about it for possible inclusion in a worldwide directory [schools@jww.org].

Another highlight of the week promotes the sharing of stories and storytelling. One of the activities likely to generate some buzz is the Digital Story Bee [http://www.bubbe.com/storybee.html]. Sponsored by Jewish Heritage Online magazine [http://www.jhom.com/], the Digital Story Bee is actually a face-to-face meeting being held in several locations around the world teaching women how to share their Jewish heritage on line. Many of those stories will end up in Bubbe's Back Porch [http://www.bubbe.com/], where you can already find anecdotes about Birth, Leaving a Homeland, In the Old Days, Romance, Assimilation and more. Don't miss the links people have set up to their own family pages. This is a lovely site.

The Centre for Jewish Culture and Creativity [http://obenamots.cc.colorado.edu/CJCC/cjcc.html] and the Jewish Artists Network will create the Kids' Mural for Peace [http://www.JewishArtists.com/Mural/default.html] honoring the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel. Children from around the world will draw a one-square-foot picture about peace and Israel on their computer. The pictures will then be e-mailed to a central location to be patched together in a massive quilt symbolizing the coming together of Jews to build the modern Israel. The quilt will be joined with an existing mural in Los Angeles [http://www.haam.media.ucla.edu/97winter1/Community2.html] and then sent to Israel for permanent exhibition.

But my favorite project is one that lets you Light up the World with Acts of Kindness and Justice. The site is co sponsored by Chabad-Lubavitch [http://festival.chabad.org/cgi-bin/chanukah.cgi] and a major donor. Throughout the week, people are encouraged to write to the site to share their stories of chesed (kindness) and other good deeds. And to top it off, the endowing foundation will donate 50 cents towards a charity in recognition of every good deed done!

This is just a small sample of what Jewish Net/Web Week holds in store for festival-goers. Explore and enjoy!

'Olympian' BJE Bible contest exercises brains

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — While Olympic athletes displayed their physical prowess vying for gold in Nagano, 28 supplementary school students demonstrated their mental acuity in the recent Bible contest sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) of UJA Federation.

"The Torah has been around for 3,000 years. The Olympics have been around for 2,000 years. This is a much more important competition than that going on in Japan," BJE executive director Rabbi Jerry Unterman told the participants and some 50 supporters.

"Some people worry about their muscles," he said. "We worry about our brains and spirit."

Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University; Dr. Ray Stern, Netivot HaTorah principal; and Rabbi Unterman were this year's judges for the contest, which focused on portions of Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy. Six supplementary Hebrew schools fielded eight teams in the annual Bible contest held this year at Netivot HaTorah Day School.

Participating schools were Beit Rayim Hebrew School and Bet Sefer Solel in a combined team; Holy Blossom Religious School; and Beth Tikvah Congregational School, the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS) and Temple Kol Ami Religious School, with two teams each.

BJE board member Baila Lubeck welcomed the group. "This is a very exciting event. It's been going on at least 20 years," she said, noting that the Toronto area was the only community to sponsor a Bible contest with team competition.

Beth Tikvah's two teams finished in first and second place this year. Their Bible studies coach Daniella Robicsek said she was proud of her students because they worked hard. Principal Samuel Kapustin stressed that while it's nice to win, that was not the primary purpose of the contest.

Rabbi Unterman shared this view. "All the kids here are winners, that's for sure. All of them learned a lot by studying for this contest," he said. "Competing is fun. It's learning that counts."

Attending her sixth consecutive Bible contest, Donna Orwin, whose two sons Ethan, 12, and Alex, 15, have competed on the DJCS teams for three years each, told The CJN the boys often discuss points in the Bible.

"I think it's wonderful," she said. But she lamented that in many circles, children's exposure to the Bible has declined significantly. "I think it's a terrible loss that our kids aren't learning the Bible culturally and spiritually."

Israeli vets to visit

TORONTO — Since 1978, disabled Israeli veterans have enjoyed a warm welcome during visits organized by Beit Halochem Canada.

Last summer, Aish HaTorah joined Beit Halochem to host 16 veterans in Toronto. This year, during Israel's 50th anniversary celebrations, Aish HaTorah is going to reconnect with the veterans in Israel.

"The connection that began when the visit was planned, and grew during their two-week stay, will be completed with a visit by a group from Toronto to the soldiers in Israel," says Henry Wigoda of Aish HaTorah.

While in Toronto, the vets enjoyed a Queen's Park reception with Lt.-Gov. Hilary Weston, and visits to SkyDome, CN Tower, Canada's Wonderland, Niagara Falls and a cruise on Lake Ontario.

During an overnight stay at Camp Wahanowin on Lake Couchiching, the group canoed, kayaked and sang around a campfire.

JF&CS seeks Jewish foster homes

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's crunch time at Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), where there's an extreme shortage of Jewish foster homes for Jewish kids.

Recent media reports focused attention on the shortage of foster homes at the Metro Children's Aid and Catholic Children's Aid societies. "We're experiencing the same problem," says JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe.

There are currently about 30 kids in Jewish foster care in and around Toronto, Wolfe says, and while JF&CS has a roster of homes it can call in an emergency, "we can't get sufficient long-term foster homes."

There are reasons, he notes. For one, kids "are getting tougher. Some are out of control." There are more dual career families, meaning no one is home to offer foster care, and the compensation the government pays – about $25 per child per day – is "inadequate. It's just not seen as worth it anymore."

A 'mitzvah'

Another problem is that because of a shortage of urban foster homes, Jewish kids from the city are being sent to live in outlying regions, meaning new schools and even more disruption in their lives.

Wolfe says JF&CS has to demonstrate that it has a reserve of ready foster homes, or else kids removed from homes are sent to institutions.

Children are removed from families for a variety of reasons: abuse, neglect or if the parents are unable to control them.

JF&CS is mandated to find Jewish foster care for Jewish children. If a child is Orthodox, every effort is made to place him in an Orthodox home, Wolfe said.

A child's average stay in foster care is roughly six months. Some foster care is short-term, but some can last years.

Given all the disincentives, why should Jewish homes take in Jewish foster kids?

"Because it's a mitzvah," Wolfe responds. "Because Jewish kids who need foster homes should have them."

Anyone willing to become a foster parent should call JF&CS at 416-638-7800.

BIALIK'S CHARITABLE CHALLENGE

Bialik Hebrew Day School Principal Shana Harris is giving straight A's to her staff for pledging their full support for UJA Federation's 1998 campaign. Now the school is challenging other schools to do the same. More than 1,200 educators work in both day and supplementary schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education.

Harris, who chairs UJA Federation's Education Division with Bernie Shoub, says she couldn't be more proud of her staff's 100% participation in helping UJA Federation raise more than $36 million this year.

"One by one everyone came on board," explains Harris, who sent letters to her entire staff asking for their support. Harris also brought in special speakers to talk about the many programs and services funded by UJA Federation.

"We relied on education to evoke positive responses," Harris explains.

"It's important to set an example of tzedakah for our students," adds teacher and Bialik librarian Marcy Abramsky. "UJA Federation does so much for our students and staff and this is our way of fulfilling our part of the partnership."

Harris hopes Bialik's efforts inspire other schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education to follow suit.

Diversity rules at Israeli school

Nearly 3,000 students and faculty at a school predating the State of Israel by several decades are practicing what the rest of the country is striving to achieve.

Students and instructors at the college, funded in part by UJA Federation donations through United Israel Appeal, form a melange of cultures and religious affiliations, working together daily. The school's halls are crowded with Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, Haredi (often called ultra-Orthodox) and completely secular students, in addition to men and women from Arab and Ethiopian backgrounds.

"We try to develop a pluralistic outlook in our students and faculty," says spokesperson Shoshi Orenstein.

The student body includes 250 Arabs, many of whom chose the college because of its enthusiastic outreach to prospective Arab teachers. Several of them will concentrate on special education, which, according to Orenstein, strongly fulfills a need to prevent Arab communities from "hiding away children who are different than the norm."

The college, renowned for its innovative initiatives, has also developed programs to stop stereotyping among young children. "We want to show children that stereotypes are not a good way to deal with people," Orenstein insists.

One program teams an Arab and a Jewish student teacher, who learn about each other's cultures and then create a method of transmitting these key cultural components to young children. The school is seeking a sponsor for a similar project twinning religious and secular students.

Another college specialty is preparing Jewish immigrants from Ethiopia for their high school matriculation exams, which they have 12 years to take from when they arrive in Israel.

The Ethiopian students are housed at the college, where they receive school books, supplies, tutoring, counseling and a living allowance – all of which places a heavy financial burden on the school.

One of the main obstacles to overcome is the cultural chasm between Ethiopian and Israeli society. "It takes them time to converse in class," notes Nomi Moushine, who heads the Ethiopian preparation project. "It's considered good manners for them not to look you in the eye. They are very closed about their feelings. It takes about a year to develop a feeling of trust."

The school will soon publish a textbook to teach Amharic (the language of Ethiopia) which, says Moushine, is already "in great demand."

Young Adults explore Holocaust through multimedia

UJA Federation's new Hands on Toronto (HOT) program for young adults is presenting a three part multimedia exploration of the Holocaust beginning next week.

Cory Gurevitz

Marcie Somers

Vision, Voices, Vanished Dreams will explore the Holocaust through contemporary film, intimate dialogue with survivors and visual arts. Hands On Toronto, launched last year, provides young Jewish adults with opportunities to be involved with meaningful communal service including organizing holiday celebrations for disadvantaged kids, spending quality time with the sick and elderly and running a free legal advice clinic.

On Sunday, February 22, 7:30 pm "The Quarrel" will be screened at Beth Sholom Synagogue, 1445 Eglinton Avenue West, followed by a discussion with the film's award-winning star R.H. Thompson.

Holocaust survivors will relate their own stories of struggle and survival in part two of the series on Tuesday, March 8, 7:30 pm at the First Narayever Synagogue, 187 Brunswick Ave. Participants will also have the opportunity to engage the survivors in one-on-one discussions.

The series will end on Tuesday, April 21, 7:30 pm at the Anshei Minsk Synagogue, 10 St. Andrew Street with poetry readings by Kenneth Sherman and an analysis of the paintings of Benzion "Benn" Robinovitch provided by Dr. Roberta Markus.

Admission costs $36 for all three programs or $18 per program. Tickets will be available at the door but can be purchased in advance by calling (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

"We're hoping to shed a different light on the Holocaust by looking at the subject through different artistic media," explains Marcie Somers, who co-chairs HOT with Cory Gurevitz.

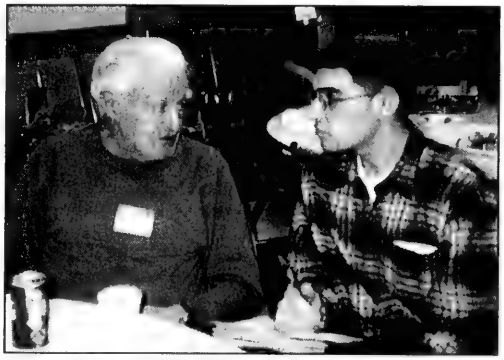
Community Matters

SENIORS TRANSMIT LESSONS FROM THE PAST

For Josh Segal, growing up Jewish in small town Ontario during the 30s and 40s was troublesome, to say the least. But rather than forget about the racial slurs and cruel jokes he endured as a young boy, Segal, now 82, has chosen to share his experience with the younger generation.

Segal, and more than 40 other Jewish seniors of similar background participating in a project funded by UJA Federation's Action Committee for Jewish Continuity, are relating their personal stories to a group of university students, in an effort to educate them about their historical heritage in Canada.



Hy Weiner and Josh Rifkind

Dozens of one-on-one interviews have been conducted as part of the "Growing Up Jewish in the 1920s-40s" program, sponsored by the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency. The project will document and archive the audio tape recordings for future use as an educational tool.

Ruth Mapa, who oversees all of the Centre's intergenerational initiatives, says "Growing Up Jewish" is already a huge success. "So many great stories have emerged from the interviews and the students and seniors are really bonding as a result of the exercise," notes Mapa.

On one occasion, Mapa recounts, following an interview, the student and the senior lighted Shabbat candles and recited the kiddush together. "The elderly woman confided to her guest that it had been many years since she welcomed Shabbat with the company of another."

Rachel Chaimovitch and Anne Hughes

York University professor Rachel Schlesinger, who helped train the student interviewers, says the project is a unique opportunity to bridge the generation gap. "Most of these seniors are born and raised in Canada and they bring a completely different perspective than the typical Eastern European bubie and zaide so many of our youth are familiar with."

Segal, who has been telling Toronto area school children about his childhood in Port Colborne, Ontario, for a few years hopes his experiences coping with anti-semitism will inspire young members of the community to strive to retain their Jewish identity, even in times of difficulty. Segal's high school days were plagued with overtly antisemitic teachers and antagonistic classmates.

"It's a lot easier to be Jewish in Canada today than it was when I was a boy," notes Segal. "But the lessons of the past should not be forgotten."

Phase two of "Growing Up Jewish in the 1920s-1940s" will begin in March when seniors will be trained to speak in front of classrooms.

Volunteer Views

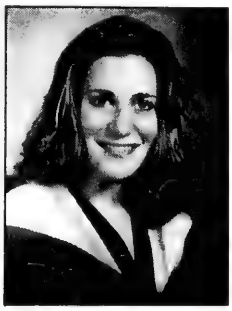
If you've made a call to Jewish Vocational Services in recent months to get help finding a job or improving your computer skills, chances are you've heard Lisa Isen's friendly voice on the other end of the line.

Twice a week, the 23-year-old McMaster graduate volunteers at JVS's career counselling department where she spends most of her time returning phone calls and booking appointments. "There's always a lot of messages everytime I come in," says Isen. "Each call is from someone who needs help."



For the last 50 years, JVS, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, has been providing a wide range of educational, career, employment and vocational rehabilitation counselling for both the Jewish and non-Jewish community.

Isen, who is currently studying social work at Seneca College with plans to do a Masters degree in the same field, says she does her best to make people feel comfortable and at ease about calling JVS for assistance. "I'm often their first contact at JVS, so it's important to be friendly and helpful."

But sharpening her social work and people skills is only part of Isen's reward. "I get to give something back to the community that has shaped my Jewish identity," explains Isen. "My work at JVS makes me feel a part of something bigger than myself."

Symposium will celebrate twinning of dental schools

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The pioneering role played by Canadian dentists in the area of teeth implants, along with a fundraising campaign to expand the Dental School at Tel Aviv University (TAU) to meet dental health needs in Israel, will be highlights of a symposium March 1.

The symposium at the Sheraton Centre Hotel here will also celebrate the continued twinning of the TAU Dental School and the University of Toronto Dental School, and the exchange for the past three years of undergraduate and graduate students.

Sponsored by Canadian Friends of TAU and Alpha Omega, the symposium revisits the corroborating and validation of implantology done by U of T scientists in 1982. The four internationally renowned speakers are headed by Dr. P.I. Branemark of Goteborg, Sweden, whose research led to the dental technique. The others are Dr. David Garber, Atlanta; Dr. Herb Judes, Tel Aviv; and Dr. George Zarb, Toronto.

"There is no question that the use of implants is now a widely accepted modality," said Dr. Ira Schecter, who heads the Alpha Omega drive in Canada to raise funds for the TAU Dental School. "Implants are widely used for adults, adolescents, children and accident victims. Forty to 50 percent of my practice is implant related."

The goals of the $3-million worldwide campaign are to provide space for a rapidly growing student body, to upgrade research facilities, to transform its three-year curriculum to a full-length six-year term and to establish the dental school as an independent unit of the university.

Alpha Omega worldwide has pledged to raise $1 million of the total campaign, which at $2.3 million, is well on the way to reaching its goal, according to Schecter.

The implant symposium in Toronto is the principal scientific activity of the worldwide campaign and one of the means by which Canadian Alpha Omega members will raise $150,000 for it.

The symposium is expected to attract 300 dentists, most of them Canadian, and to focus attention on the key role research in Toronto played.

Greater Toronto Area

Downtown Toronto boasts vibrant community

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you think the Jewish presence in the Greater Toronto Area ends south of Beth Tzedec, think again.

An estimated 15,000 to 20,000 Jews – roughly 10 percent of the 160,000-strong Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area – live south of St. Clair Avenue, about the same number that live in Ottawa or Calgary, says Karen Chisvin, chair of the Downtown Jewish Community Council (DJCC).

Although part of the wider community, many view themselves as a sort of distinct society.

"Downtown is a state of mind," says Chisvin, who lives near Avenue Road and Eglinton. "We use a relatively loose definition of downtown. For instance, there may be people who live at Eglinton and Bathurst but belong to the [Bloor Jewish Community Centre] and identify with downtown."

"I think there's a sense that Jews downtown...are looking to be Jewish, not happening to be Jewish. They don't take it for granted," she adds.

The DJCC was formed in 1992 to protect the community's special needs in the wake of UJA/Federation's proposed sale of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), part of a process leading to its rebirth as a separate entity from the current Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Less conservative religiously and politically, downtown has a high proportion of professionals and "a higher number of intermarried families who want to find Jewish resources for their families," says Chisvin, a 42 year-old architect and mother of two.

"[Downtown is] a community with it's own set of local needs, and for those involved in organizational life downtown, it's important for [the UJA/Federation] to recognize that there are needs downtown that are different from elsewhere," says founding former DJCC chair and York University sociologist Stuart Schoenfeld.

At the urging of Rabbi Chezi Zionce of the Brunswick Ave. First Narayever Congregation, "eight or so charter member organizations met to provide "strength in numbers and to let downtown groups know about each other...[in] a kind of downtown support group," Chisvin says.

The loosely organized and diverse council has no constitution and meets at the JCC for only one hour "five or six times a year." It's comprised of 20 community service organizations and synagogues located mostly south of St. Clair Ave.

But some – like the 600-member egalitarian First Narayever, founded in 1918 – have been revitalized over the past 20 years by Jews attracted by downtown's vitality.

Other members include the West End Jewish Community Association, which caters to Jews in neighborhoods like Parkdale and High Park, and the Davisville Village Chaverim, a social group of about sixty North Toronto families.

She says however, "We've had support, but I think when we represent 10 percent of the population and are geographically separate from the Jewish population at large, we have to continuously make noise to be noticed."

Citing its lack of a budget or fundraising campaign, she stresses the council "is not a rival organization [to UJA/Federation], nor is it intended to be one."

UJA/Federation has a much wider mandate, she says, and supports the council through funding to member organizations, like Habayit Shelanu Senior Residences at Spadina and Davenport.

It also provides funding indirectly through the JCC, which pays $22,000 for the DJCC's part-time administrator and the production of a yearly DJCC informational pamphlet. The council's UJA/Federation representatives also keep members abreast of uptown events and offer support like printing and distributing materials, Chisvin says.

At the Feb. 4 meeting, a representative from the cultural group Ashkenaz tried to garner support for workshops to help members prepare booths for a March 8 Purim Shpiel at the JCC.

As well, the council's BBYO representatives asked for donations of time, money and teens for a proposed April 26 JCC beach party celebrating Israel's 50th birthday. Many council members hope the event will lead to a permanent BBYO chapter downtown.

The Downtown Jewish Learning Council, a DJCC subcommittee, also recommended that council support programming by Ohr Olam, an outreach group seeking to promote unity in the Jewish community.

A teen's battle with anorexia

This third instalment of a four-part series on eating disorders is the story of Tovi Speisman, an 18-year-old alumna of Eitz Chaim Day School and Bais Yaakov High School for Girls.
Next week: Recovery.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tovi Speisman's decision to eat an apple instead of an orange is a small victory in her fight against anorexia. The slight 18-year-old, wearing a track suit for warmth and hugging her knees to her chest as she sits in a comfy armchair, explains how she has "spited" the anorexia by choosing the fruit with 15 extra calories.

After three years of struggling with an eating disorder, Tovi reached a turning point this past December when she was in the Toronto Hospital for 17 days to stabilize her life-threatening symptoms. She realized she didn't want to end up like some of the other patients who had had eating disorders for decades.

Her illness, characterized by self-induced starvation, took hold when Tovi was in her mid-teens. In retrospect, there were a number of contributing factors.

An annual check-up by a new physician (following the death of her pediatrician) was one trigger, Tovi believes. "I was about 14. I had started watching what I was eating and cutting out some junk food. The doctor said, 'You can tell she's doing a good job because she's pretty thin.' Then she weighed my twin sister and said she was even slimmer than I was. I freaked out. I already felt horrible about myself."

Two years earlier, a group of boys had ganged up on Tovi, swearing at her and taunting her as she waited to cross the street at a red light. The incident filled her with such shame she didn't even tell her family for a week.

"That was one of the first times I ever thought about my weight," she recalls.

At 15, she fell into a deep depression and believed "there was nothing good about me at all. Everybody seemed to have everything planned out except me. I thought I'd never get married, never get a job, have a boyfriend."

Ironically, her anorexia, which began as a quest for self-improvement, became an all-too-common nightmare.

"It started off like a normal diet, something I could control," Tovi recalls, but soon the anorexia was controlling her. However thin she became, she felt she was too fat. She restricted her meagre food intake further. Self-induced vomiting and compulsive exercise eventually compounded the problem.

By the time she entered the Toronto Hospital in December, her weight had plummeted to below 65 pounds on her 5-foot frame and her blood pressure was dangerously low.

It was Tovi's fourth hospitalization, although she would have been admitted on other occasions had there been a bed. After a few days of nourishment, Tovi began to feel better, but, she warns, anorexia can damage your body "forever." Tovi has been told, among other things, she has irreversible osteoporosis.

"I'm eating and I'm fighting like crazy," she said recently, sitting with her parents in the living room of their home. "It hasn't been easy. I want [the anorexia] to go away completely. I can honestly say I hate it with a passion."

To Tovi, anorexia is a big red blob of a monster. At her lowest point – when the mere act of sitting on a bus hurt her bones and she "wanted to die just to end the suffering" – the monster was "giant."

Now, she says, delineating its contours in the air with her delicate hands, it's shrunk to "smaller than my head.

"Every time I do something it tells me not to do, the monster gets smaller."

The difference between Tovi now and in December, when she spoke to The CJN in her hospital room, is striking. As her "monster" weakens, Tovi's sense of self – and, to her own and her family's delight, her sense of humor – is gaining strength. She would like to go back to school and has started to volunteer part time. She has even been able to laugh at herself, something that never would have happened a few months ago.

But she is passionately serious about going public with her story. "I don't think it's something that should be kept secret. I think this is important. I want people to know my name and what I think about it. I hate when they change the name. It's as if we're depraved criminals."

Her parents Leila and Stephen, who already have a heightened profile in the Jewish community, back her decision.

"I don't mind at all," said Leila, a CJN reporter who "pushed buttons all over the place trying to get help. I don't see it as something to be ashamed of. It's an illness, and I think one of the reasons it's so hard to get help for these girls, especially in the Orthodox community, is that so many people for so long have kept it secret. I would put a sign in front of my house if I thought it would help."

Stephen, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, is more reticent. He was not initially in favor of going public, but after "careful consideration," he believes Tovi is right. "The fact is that people can be helped if they're not afraid to see a problem and deal with the problem, especially in the Jewish community.

"The issue with me is not this particular subject," he explained. "I'm not ashamed of it, but I'm uncomfortable with having private issues aired in print."

By going public, Tovi and her parents hope to prove that the problem not only affects real people but people in the Orthodox community.

One woman who didn't know of Tovi's illness had told Leila anorexia doesn't happen in the frum community.

Their rabbi, Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, was more enlightened. "We couldn't have asked for more understanding or compassion, but there really wasn't much he could do," said Leila.

"It's amazing the number of families within the Jewish community who've been affected," said Stephen. Many of the people he's told about Tovi's illness responded by sharing stories of their own relatives who have eating disorders.

In some circles, however, the Speismans believe there is no understanding whatever.

Although most of the people they confided in were sympathetic and supportive, the family encountered "appalling judgmentalism" from certain members of the Jewish community. "It's very damaging," said Stephen. "Ignorance one can excuse. Lack of sensitivity one cannot, especially in people who claim to be living in imitation of G-d."

The Speismans encountered "the sense that if Tovi had faith in G-d, this wouldn't have happened," said Leila.

Tovi admits she was scared of growing up. In fact, she doesn't think she ever reached a normal adult weight, but recently she's grown one inch in height.

"Anorexia was my way of communicating how I felt."

Now Tovi feels she can ask for help. "It's still scary, but it's a big relief to say it. When you keep things inside, you think you're the only one who feels that way.

"I do try to talk more. I feel I can talk to my mother and my father. I can say things I couldn't say before. And it wasn't because of them. I felt embarrassed for me."

Tovi still tires quickly and bruises easily. She no longer restricts her food intake, but still fights the urge to over-exercise. She still treats food "as medicine," eating a prescribed amount to restore her health.

One night recently, she was still hungry after dinner and helped herself to a muffin. When Leila reassured her that her response was perfectly normal, Tovi's initial panic subsided almost immediately.

"I'm a lot happier now. I get my moments, but the difference is they don't last forever like they used to.

"Anorexia is all-consuming – pardon the pun," laughs Tovi. "But now it's just sort of there. I'm trying to control it. It's not controlling me.

"Wanting to be alive, feeling alive, for me, is such a big deal."

Anorexia takes toll on all family members

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joanna Stavsky, Tovi Speisman's recently married older sister, used to approach her sister's bedroom with trepidation when their mother would ask her to peek in.

"Tovi would be asleep a lot. Every time I had to check on her, I was terrified I'd walk in and she would be dead."

Although Tovi didn't realize the extent of her sister's fear, she felt guilty about the toll she knew her anorexia was taking on her family.

"Tovi became what is known in psychological language as the identified patient," explained her father Stephen. "Her needs had to take precedence over other members of the family who also had real needs."

The Speisman's daily routines centred around Tovi's needs, including numerous medical appointments. When Tovi was hospitalized, the family would spend Shabbat downtown to be with her.

"The major effect was frustration. We wanted to be able to help Tovi and we didn't know how," said Stephen.

"And then even when we were given some medical advice, the advice was not to push her, to leave her alone. That makes it very difficult. You see your child wasting away in front of you. It's not easy. And you see her suffering. It's created a lot of stress."

With all that modern medicine can do, long-term recovery isn't possible unless the patient takes an active role. "It's not the 15th century. There's got to be something you can do – and there's nothing," said Tovi's mother Leila, her voice infused with pain. "And you love this child so much."

"You were trying so hard," Tovi told Leila. "You wanted to make me better, and I wanted to make you happy by showing you you could. Everything you said was so important to me, but I couldn't do it. I couldn't get better for you. It hurt me."

"People should know it's an illness," said Leila. "Don't tell the child, 'All you have to do is eat and you'll be better,' and don't tell the parents, 'Cook good food and they'll eat.' Don't tell them to make her eat. You don't tell someone with cancer, 'Just get better.'

"One thing I don't think people know until they've been through it is the incredible internal pain that people involved go through," Leila added. "You feel that pain constantly every night and day. It doesn't go away."

Jewish treatment programs unavailable

TORONTO — It can take months to get an assessment, let alone a bed, in an eating disorder treatment program like the one at the Toronto Hospital, but to get into a Jewish treatment program – at least for the moment – is just a dream.

"There's not one residential program for frum kids in the United States or Canada," said Leila Speisman, a CJN reporter whose daughter Tovi has had anorexia for the past three years. "There's so much money, so many people, and not one program."

In an attempt to find a Jewish treatment facility for her daughter, Leila contacted two Jewish organizations that help locate medical resources for people who need them. She was told such a facility didn't exist in North America.

The role food plays in Jewish life, particularly during Jewish holidays, creates some specific issues for Jewish patients and their families, said Leila.

When Tovi spoke to non-Jewish anorexic patients in the hospital, she could relate to some of their comments about family holiday celebrations like Christmas.

But Passover, with its eight-day focus on food, is in a class by itself. "Pesach is the worst," says Tovi.

Jewish support groups – not necessarily Orthodox ones – for patients and their families would also be helpful, Leila believes. One such group, believed to be the first of its kind, is being created for Orthodox girls with eating disorders in New York's Crown Heights area.

Leila's husband Stephen doesn't believe Jewish support groups will catch on until the stigma of eating disorders is erased through education.

"I still believe if more people talked about it in the frum community, there might be some help for people," Leila said. "This is a real problem."

Jewish frats, sorority thriving in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Forget the beer bashes, toga parties and Animal House antics.

Fraternities and sororities these days are more preoccupied with philanthropy and friendship than with benders and partying.

There are even Jewish frats and sororities. But what makes a university fraternity or sorority Jewish anyway?

Is it enough that the vast majority of "brothers," "sisters" or "pledges" are Jewish?

Or should it be defined more by being active in Jewish community life?

In the case of Montreal, the answer is both.

Several Jewish frats and one Jewish sorority are thriving on local campuses.

Hazan, a 19-year-old political science and history student, estimates that up to 70 percent of the membership in his frat at McGill is Jewish.

An even higher percentage of Jews make up McGill's Pi Lamda Phi fraternity – as much as 95 percent.

The Jewish sorority – also defined by its almost total Jewish membership – is McGill's Lamda Epsilon Phi.

But according to "brother" Michael Szlamkowicz, a 21-year-old commerce student, Alpha Epsilon Pi, which has a joint chapter at Concordia, is the only fraternity actually chartered as Jewish in Montreal.

What makes a fraternity "charterable" in the first place is that it has to be "international," meaning that the same frat exists on other North American campuses and that there are contacts between them.

At McGill, Alpha Epsilon Pi is comprised largely of out-of-town students (read that Torontonians), and the fraternity has even attracted a couple of non-Jewish members.

For one thing, Szlamkowicz pointed out, it would be discriminatory and even illegal for a frat or sorority to bar someone based on religion (or, for that matter, race).

But Alpha Epsilon Pi would not restrict membership to Jews even if it could. Membership is defined by the word fraternity, and the sense of camaraderie that prevails is the overriding priority.

That being said, Alpha Epsilon Pi is indeed Jewish both in its charter and in the good works it performs for Jewish and non-Jewish causes.

Working with Hillel and the Student Federation of FEDERATION CJA last year, it held a Midterm Madness Party to raise funds for the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA).

The frat also has volunteered for the Friends for AIDS bazaar, has raised funds for Le Mercaz, has sponsored Shabbat dinners at the Hillel House, and has ties with the Chabad House (such as Purim parties).

Although there are a couple of shomrei Shabbat members living at the frat house on Milton Street, the policy of the house is to be open and pluralistic. The frat stages no activities on Friday nights and kosher needs are accommodated.

Carrie Goldstein, one of the founders of the Lamda Epsilon Phi sorority, describes its mandate as being, a "Jewish sorority in terms of our causes and tradition."

Like the Alpha Epsilon Pi Jewish frat, the sorority has also done its share of good works for non-Jewish and Jewish causes, including pediatric AIDS, the Golden Age Association and CJA's Campus Division.

The sorority also takes part in the occasional Shabbat dinner at Hillel House and will be there for its next Purim party.

But unlike Alpha Epsilon Pi, the sorority has not been able to be chartered yet as "Jewish," because it is local.

Goldstein said Lamda Epsilon Phi is modelled after the internationally chartered sorority Alpha Epsilon Phi, but the bureaucracy at McGill – meaning the Pan-Hellenic Society group that oversees campus fraternities and sororities – has so far prevented her sorority from becoming chartered because it had some questions about why there should be "just Jewish members."

Goldstein's answer was that while it describes itself "up front" as a Jewish sorority, it is not "exclusionary" and also accepts non-Jewish members.

Besides the senses of fellowship and friendship engendered through being "sisters" and part of McGill's "Greek" community, Goldstein said Lamda Epsilon Phi has "gained some footing and respect since we've gotten it off the ground, and it's added something to campus life and to the Jewish community."

Helping singles find their bashert

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A unique workshop will take place at Temple Sholom in Vancouver Feb. 21 and 22.

Facilitated by Efraim (Fred) Eisen and Rosalie Harris-Eisen, the Basherte Workshop, attempts to help Jewish singles find their bashert.

"We think we have developed a process for Jewish singles to meet each other in a non-threatening, safe and traditionally based environment that also combines the best of contemporary psychology," says Eisen.

Eisen, Hillel director at the University of Oregon in Eugene, and Harris-Eisen, a financial planner who has worked for many years in the educational field, met in 1991 at a major Jewish gathering in Philadelphia.

It was their "bashert" meeting, says Harris-Eisen that made her "wonder what individuals and communities were doing to help connect Jewish singles with one another".

Six years ago, Eisen and Harris-Eisen began presenting their Basherte workshop across North America.

Using storytelling, guided imagery, music, process exercises and prayer, the workshop "takes participants through Torah aspects of people meeting each other," says Eisen.

A workshop that they conducted at the Jewish Renewal Kallah in Colorado last summer attracted more than 125 Jewish singles from all over the United States, Canada, Europe, Israel and South America.

A highlight of the workshop was a Shabbat afternoon gathering around a lake in which 75 couples were invited to give blessings to those still seeking their bashert.

Lorne Mallin, a Vancouverite, was so impressed with the workshop that he spearheaded a campaign to bring Eisen and Harris-Eisen to Vancouver.

Mallin formed a committee to arrange and promote the workshop in Vancouver.

Aimee Promislow, a committee member who had attended the Basherte Workshop at the 1995 Jewish Renewal Kallah in Fort Collins, Colorado says "Even today, over two years after the workshop, the skills I learned have stayed with me."

J.B. was active in Jewish causes

to see first hand the quality of life under Communist rule.

It was at that time that he was confronted with the truth of the horrors in Eastern Europe. He even met with Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev, but he was cautioned not to make a public issue of the Jewish situation.

When he returned to Canada, however, he wrote a series of articles on his Russian visit, exposing the treachery of the Soviet regime.

He broke with the Communist party of Canada and many friends and colleagues followed his lead. The party was thereby effectively destroyed as a political force in Canadian politics.

At the same time, he also left the Communist-dominated United Jewish People's Order and formed the New Fraternal Jewish Association of Toronto – a left-wing group, free of any Russian ties.

He then turned his considerable energies to a number of Jewish causes, in particular to the resurgence of Yiddish and to the welfare of the State of Israel. Indeed, there is a medical clinic in Bat Yam today that bears his name. He also became an active member of the executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and other Jewish organizations.

It was under his initiative as chair of the Committee for Yiddish some 25 years ago, that the University of Toronto established its first Yiddish courses.

His funeral last week in Toronto, officiated by Cantor Tobi Gabriel, was attended by more than 500 people. Four eulogies were delivered, two in Yiddish, two in English.

Speaking in English, Prof. Irving Abella noted how Eastern European newcomers had transformed this country and had established the foundation of Jewish life here. "Joe Salsberg was the engine for much of these developments," he said

"He was a unique natural resource, a community treasure," Abella added. "He was a community ombudsman long before we ever heard of the term."

He noted that J.B. was one of the first voices raised on behalf of Refuseniks in the Soviet Union. He travelled throughout the country and beyond, Abella said, to draw the world's attention to the violation of human rights, especially Jewish rights in Russia.

"His Jewishness transcended everything...How lucky we were to have known him. How lucky we were to have had him with us for so long," Abella concluded.

J.B. Salsberg and then-federal NDP leader David Lewis.

Ben Kayfetz, speaking in Yiddish, reflected on J.B.'s contributions to society and his willingness to travel throughout the country to raise money on behalf of Israeli and local charities.

He also recalled J.B.'s colorful career as an MPP. A reporter from the Toronto Telegram once told him that when Joe Salsberg was an MPP in Queens Park and word got around that he was about to deliver a speech in the Assembly, reporters "made a beeline for the speaker's chambers — they didn't want to miss a single word of what he was going to say."

Prof. Itche Goldberg of New York, J.B.'s friend and brother-in-law, said, "Yossel was always a mentsh." He added that, although J.B. believed in cultural pluralism, he had deep respect for the traditional elements of our people.

Speaking of J.B.'s "shattering moment" when he discovered the lies and deceit of the Soviet Union, Goldberg said, "Joe Salsberg spoke out against the evils which happened in the Soviet Union. He was the first voice among the left-wing Jewish leaders and intellectuals on a world scale – the only one and the first one."

Sam Lipshitz also spoke at the funeral.

On the day of his funeral, Salsberg was also eulogized in the Senate by Senator Jerry Grafstein.

When J.B. was asked in an interview what he would like to see on his epitaph, he replied, "Here lies a man who tried to do the right thing."

He was married to Dora Wilensky-Salsberg, a social worker who died in 1959. He was brother and brother-in-law of Nathan and Lillian Salsberg, Robert and Rene Salsberg, Thelma and Maxwell Pritzker, Betty and the late Syd Troster, and uncle to many nieces and nephews and grand-nieces and nephews.

An annual lectureship at a major university on aspects related to Yiddish is being planned by Grafstein and Hershell Ezrin, a nephew of Salsberg, as a perpetual memorial tribute. Anyone interested in helping to develop the lectureship may telephone Grafstein's Toronto office at 416-369-4108.

A community-wide shloshim service for J.B. Salsberg will take place March 16 at 7:30 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building.

Filmmaker denied screening on French TV

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Can a documentary film taking a critical look at fascism and anti-Semitism in Quebec in the 1930s get an airing on French-language television?

Eric Scott thinks the answer is no. But he can't be sure because he's never received a clear reason from TV program directors for the rejection of his script for Je me souviens, a documentary inspired by Esther Delisle who exposed the prevalence of anti-Semitic and extreme right-wing ideology within mainstream French-Canadian nationalist thought in her book The Traitor and the Jew.

In 1995, Scott, an independent filmmaker, received grants from Telefilm Canada and Société de développement des entreprises culturelles du Québec for his proposal to examine the controversy that surrounded Delisle's research, originally carried out for a doctoral thesis.

Scott interviewed those who were either witnesses to this period or have studied it, and sought opinions from both Delisle's detractors and defenders. However, Scott acknowledges that this is a "point of view" documentary, starting from the premise that, while fascism had its individual adherents in the rest of North America during this period, anti-Semitism had the "open support of the major French-Canadian institutions" in Quebec.

"Anti-Semites in Quebec were not society's cranks. They were French Canada's leading scholars, church leaders, politicians and professors. This story has been a taboo subject in Quebec for years, concealed yet ironically compelled to be defended after every new revelation," Scott wrote in the proposal.

Specifically, Delisle examined the records of Le Devoir, the influential daily newspaper; l'Action nationale, the leading nationalist monthly; Jeune Canada, a prominent nationalist youth organization; and the speeches and writings of historian/priest Lionel Groulx, still an icon to many of today's nationalists.

Among those taped were Laval University political science professor Jacques Zylberberg, who was Delisle's thesis adviser and a staunch defender; and Pierre Anctil and Guy-Antoine Lafleur, academic jury members who voted against Delisle's thesis. Delisle herself is prominently featured, asserting that Quebecers would prefer to ignore this part of their past and anyone who breaks that silence will, like she has, find themselves ostracized.

Scott's intention has always been that the film should be made in French for a francophone audience first. Accordingly, he submitted the script to the provincially-owned Télé-Québec and was quickly swept aside. "I was told they absolutely could not have a film about [Delisle] on TV," Scott said.

With the other public broadcaster, Radio-Canada (CBC's French division), the process has been less direct and more frustrating. After repeated responses that the project required further study, Scott's only formal rejection is a note from Lina Allard, Radio-Canada's director of TV news and public affairs.

Allard did not respond herself to a question from The CJN on why Radio-Canada was not interested in the film. A secretary returned the call to say simply that the project "does not meet Radio-Canada's programming objectives."

Scott, a native Montrealer who has worked in TV and documentary film production since the early '80s including a stint at CNN in New York, is convinced that the merit of his work is not the problem, but rather that it is the subject matter that is too sensitive for Quebecers to face.

That suspicion was raised last May when Scott read an unflattering piece about his project in Le Devoir.

We care.

We take this opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to the State of Israel and its centrality in our lives.

While we regret the missed opportunity to resolve the conversion debate, we thank and support all members of the Ne'eman Committee for their extraordinary efforts to promote Klal Yisrael and the unity of the Jewish people.

In this, Israel's 50th anniversary year, we pray that all involved in the ongoing dialogue will exercise restraint in both word and deed. We emphasize the necessity to continue our Jewish community's tradition of mutual respect and tolerance, recognizing that, as one people, we must build bridges, not barriers.

Unity debate moves to Supreme Court

OTTAWA — The future of Quebec in Canada is being debated this week in a most unlikely setting.

This historic discussion is not taking place in Parliament. Nor is it underway in the Quebec National Assembly.

Rather, all unity attention is focused on the Supreme Court of Canada.

As part of its get-tough approach with Quebec separatists, the federal government has asked the country's top court to decide whether the province has the right to unilaterally separate from the rest of Canada.

Ottawa has resorted to its sparingly-used power of reference – in essence it has asked the high court for its legal opinion.

Technically, the answer that will come from the nine justices later this year, as suddenly as the white smoke emerges from the Vatican when a new pope is chosen, is just that, an opinion.

In practice, it will be as binding as any other high court pronouncement.

Dozens of black-robed lawyers are presenting complex legal arguments on constitutional and international law.

Besides the government representatives (Canada, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Yukon and Northwest Territories), there are lawyers for groups speaking for women, aboriginals and ethnic minorities.

(Ironically, Quebec, the government most affected by the historic case, has refused to take part and so the Supreme Court has appointed a separatist Quebec City lawyer as an amicus curiae or "friend of the court" to present the legal arguments the province would otherwise have made.)

But there is no direct spokesgroup for the Jewish community in one of the most important cases the Supreme Court has ever heard.

Canadian Jewish Congress didn't seek to join.

"We did not give any serious consideration to intervening in this particular case," said executive director Jack Silverstone.

"It's an issue of general interest to all Canadians and we didn't think that there was any uniquely Jewish perspective that would be helpful to the Supreme Court in determining the issues."

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada did try to join the legal fight, but too late in the game.

It applied less than a month before the hearings – and more than a year after the other groups were given permission to intervene – and Chief Justice Antonio Lamer said allowing B'nai Brith in at such a late date would force a delay of the oft-delayed case.

"Probably one of the most important, if not the major concern of the Jewish community of Quebec right now is the future of Canada, whether Quebec will stay part of Canada," said Quebec regional director Robert Libman.

"Because of that we feel we should intervene in as many aspects of that debate as possible."

Libman is no stranger to the Quebec unity debate – he founded the English-rights Equality party and last year won a historic Supreme Court ruling declaring unconstitutional parts of Quebec's referendum spending law.

"As issues that affect the Jewish community evolve, the community has to take on some of these issues.

"Anti-Semitism may have been a big issue for the Jewish community 30 or 40 years ago in Quebec and now it's Canadian unity that is of great concern. So I don't think there's anything wrong with Jewish organizations evolving their focus based on what the key issues of concern to the community are." But it wasn't a total loss for B'nai Brith.

Issue of general interest to Canadians

The Supreme Court instructed the amicus curiae to deal "in an objective way" with the position the Jewish organization would have made.

For the record then, here's what B'nai Brith would have said had it been allowed to formally present its arguments.

Winnipeg immigration lawyer David Matas' complex written submission only deals with one of the three questions the Supreme Court is being asked – under international law, can Quebec unilaterally separate from the rest of Canada?

Surprisingly, Matas says Quebec can unilaterally secede, but only where the human rights of the people of Quebec are being violated "in a grave manner" either by the Canadian government or sections of the population from which the government is either unable or unwilling to offer protection.

Thankfully, Matas argues that is not the case.

"The League submits that the government of Canada does not violate gravely the human rights of the people or peoples of Quebec.

"Furthermore, there do not exist in Canada sections of the population committing serious discriminatory offensive acts against the people or peoples of Quebec which the government of Canada is knowingly tolerating.

"Moreover, there is no clear and convincing evidence that the government of Canada is unable to offer protection to the people or peoples of Quebec from grave human rights violations. The presumption that Canada as a democratic country with an independent judiciary offers protection to the people or peoples of Quebec from grave human rights violations has not been rebutted."

Israel believes low probability of Iraqi attack

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Home Front reservists are being called up for one or two-day training stints to update their knowledge about protection against chemical and biological attacks, Home Front command heads said Sunday, amid conflicting messages about how much the public should prepare for a missile attack by Iraq.

Senior command officers also announced they are stepping up the distribution of gas masks.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that Iraq would be "highly ill-advised" to fire missiles at Israel if a war erupted in the Gulf, although assessments remained that there is a very low probability of Israel being attacked.

A senior official in the Home Front command said that there were plans to open up 10 more mask distribution centres this week, four in the Tel Aviv area, four in the central region and two in Haifa.

The Home Front command is capable of opening some 150 centres in time of emergency, he said. Until now, only soldiers in the standing army have been involved in distributing gas mask kits, and no reservists have been called up.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai also announced plans to start handing out gas masks to hundreds of thousands of foreign workers, tourists, and diplomats.

"We have protection for all those foreigners and tourists that are under our jurisdiction. There will be gas mask kits for all of them," Mordechai told Israel Radio.

Meanwhile, an airlift of defensive equipment to cope with a non-conventional weapons attack continued. Nineteen Boeing 747 cargo jets loaded with gas masks have arrived so far from Germany and the Netherlands.

Masks for children were scheduled to have arrived from Sweden Monday, Defence Ministry officials said.

Next week the United States is to begin an airlift of medical equipment and other supplies which Mordechai had requested of U.S. Secretary of Defence William Cohen, the officials added.

OC Home Front Command Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ofir urged the public to be prepared, and to begin purchasing plastic sheeting used to seal up a room for protection against a non-conventional weapons attack. But he said it was too early to seal up a room.

Mordechai's office later issued a contradictory statement, saying that no instructions had been issued in view of what is considered to be a very low probability that there would be an attack on Israel.

So far 315,000 people have updated their masks at 41 distribution stations throughout the country.

But Home Front command officers said that 1.7 million Israelis have still not updated their kits. A senior commander said that various measures were being considered in case there was a need to speed up mask deliveries, such as the operation of distribution mobiles.

The officer said that gas mask distribution in the Arab sector was focusing on densely populated regions under the greatest threat, but that if the need arises, every citizen would have a gas mask "down to the last Beduin in the Negev."

Netanyahu told the cabinet yesterday that if the United States's primary objective in Iraq – the destruction of weapons of mass destruction – is not achieved by diplomatic means, then the United States would launch a massive attack on this arsenal.

Asked in a question and answer session on CNN what outcome he would like to see to the crisis, Netanyahu said "I would like to see the missiles dismantled without the use of force. I agree with President Clinton that he must check this proliferation of missiles."

In reply to a question about how the crisis would affect the peace process, Netanyahu said, "If Saddam has unencumbered access to unconventional weapons this would undermine the peace process."

Asked what he would do if Saddam launched missiles at Israel, Netanyahu said "First of all, I hope he doesn't fire. If he fires a missile or missiles into Israel, I think that would be highly ill-advised on his part."

Netanyahu reassured ministers that Israel is not involved in the dispute, but that contingency plans are being drawn up regarding possible effects on the home front and the functioning of government offices.

The consensus in the cabinet was that the probability of an Iraqi missile attack on Israel is "very low."

U.S. National Security Advisor Sandy Berger issued a blunt warning that if diplomacy failed, U.S. forces would hit Iraq repeatedly to cripple any residual capacity to rebuild its arsenal of chemical and biological weapons.

According to Sunday's edition of the New York Times, Saddam has reverted to the furtive life he led during the Gulf War, moving from house to house and employing decoys and disguises.

The newspaper identified its sources as "several senior officials who worked for him and met with him, Arab cabinet ministers who have visited him recently and Arab intelligence officers monitoring Iraq."

Ne'eman proposal rejected

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Reform and Conservative movement leaders last week denounced the Israeli Chief Rabbinate's rejection of a key component of a compromise proposal aimed at resolving the controversial issue of conversions in Israel.

The Chief Rabbinate "declared war on the Reform and Conservative movements," the heads of those movements in Israel said in a joint statement a week ago Monday.

Rabbi Uri Regev and Rabbi Ehud Bandel, the Reform and Conservative representatives on the committee that had worked seven months to hammer out a proposal, said that in taking this step, "the Chief Rabbinate is in danger of splitting the Jewish people.

The strong words came after Israel's Chief Rabbinate Council rejected the creation of a conversion-training institute in which non-Orthodox rabbis would participate. The institute, which would be overseen by the Jewish Agency for Israel, was a key component of the compromise proposal reached by the Ne'eman Committee last month.

The proposal also included a provision that all conversions in Israel would continue to be performed only by Orthodox officials.

The Rabbinic Council, which met for several hours, restricted its discussion to the Ne'eman Committee's recommendation that conversions be conducted in Israel in accordance with Halachah (Jewish religious law).

It was not immediately clear what impact the decision would have on efforts to reach a compromise on the conversion issue. The Ne'eman Committee, chaired by Israel's finance minister, Ya'acov Ne'eman, had been meeting since last year in an effort to achieve a compromise acceptable to all of Judaism's religious streams.

The religious parties in the Knesset are now likely to press for resumption of legislative action on a bill that would set into law the Orthodox establishment's sole authority over conversions in Israel. The bill already passed the first of three legislative hurdles last year.

At the same time, however, a majority of Knesset members recently said they would oppose such legislation.

And court cases brought by the Reform and Conservative movements, which are seeking recognition of their authority in Israel, are now likely to move ahead after being put on hold while a compromise was sought.

Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau said after the meeting that the council had not been asked to address other proposals in the Ne'eman Committee's report, including the call for the conversion institute.

Majority of Knesset opposes legislation

Asked whether a rabbinical court would confirm a conversion candidate who had been trained by the non-Orthodox movements, Rabbi Lau told Israel Radio, "Each person will be judged as an individual, according to personality, thoughts and knowledge.

"We will not ask, 'Where did you learn?'" he added. "If this milestone is handled according to the Halachah, we will embrace it, and say, 'Welcome brother.'"

Just the same, it appeared that the Chief Rabbinate Council would not accept the creation of the joint conversion institute.

In a statement released after its meeting, the council lashed out at those "who are trying to shake the foundations of the Jewish religion, causing rifts among the people and causing them to stray from the generations-old heritage."

The statement did not actually name the Reform and Conservative movements, but it seemed clear they were the intended targets.

Such efforts "have already had a disastrous effect and caused confusion among Diaspora Jewry," the statement said. "The sages of Israel have barred any cooperation with them and their methods, and no one should consider establishing joint institutions with them."

The Chief Rabbinate's decision was not unexpected.

Anticipating such a rejection, Reform and Conservative movement officials had moved forward to approve a technical solution brokered by Jewish Agency chair, Avraham Burg, to address the conversion issue. The solution relates to the registration for civil purposes only, of conversions performed by the non-Orthodox establishment.

An American leader of the Reform movement predicted that the technical solution – first proposed seven months ago at the start of the Ne'eman Committee's negotiations – would be worked out in a manner acceptable to both the Chief Rabbinate and the liberal movements in Israel.

If one is implemented, the State of Israel would recognize as legitimate the conversions to Judaism performed by non-Orthodox rabbis for the first time.

"We don't expect the ultra-Orthodox to accept us," said Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America. "But they're not entitled to have a monopoly over religious life."

Ganchrow said, however, he did not anticipate that a technical solution would be worked out.

No more important issue than Jewish unity: Rabbi Poupko

Canadian rabbis comment on Ne'eman's rejected proposal

He charged that the Chief Rabbinate "regretfully," has lost an important opportunity to be "a force for Jewish unity that would have gained respect for Jewish tradition in the eyes of Israelis, Jews in the Diaspora and non-Jews throughout the world."

Holy Blossom Temple's Rabbi Dow Marmur was blunt. "Even a minimal acknowledgement of other streams is impossible for the Chief Rabbinate Council and many others.

"To maintain their own myth about having a franchise on Judaism, they are willing to sacrifice even civility or an attempt to build bridges. There is a total disregard for the situation of Diaspora Jews – no sensitivity or understanding of where Jewish creativity and strength are," he said.

There are some positive aspects to the situation, Rabbi Marmur said. "There is a greater cohesiveness between non-Orthodox streams. They recognize that they have a task to fulfil that they can only carry out together."

Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation and president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, said he is surprised, not by the decision of the chief rabbis, but by the Conservative and Reform reaction to it.

Stressing that he was speaking personally, he said Torah Judaism "teaches that there is a halachic system of divine origin. What is being asked is for Torah Judaism to accept legally groups that have compromised away those values."

Rabbi Stern said he hoped that the entire community would continue to work together to support the state of Israel, and for such causes as Israel Bonds and UJA.

Rabbi Moshe Lowy of Agudath Israel Congregation went farther.

"The chief rabbis," he said, "deserve our deep gratitude for their unwavering commitment to Torah that was given at Sinai, as interpreted by Chazal (the sages), despite the political pressures put on them.

"They have heeded the warning of the gedolim (the great scholars) who warn against dilution of the morals or the teaching of Torah."

He insisted that "we are not ignoring the other streams. We stretch our hand in love to any Jew from any denomination. However, we must not take the Torah and interpret it according to our own wishes and whims. We must uphold it."

Rabbi Reuven Poupko, spiritual leader of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Montreal, confessed to only being surprised by "those who unrealistically thought that the Ne'eman Committee could resolve such a ticklish question."

While he said that he is "reticent to criticize the decision of the Chief Rabbinate because of my full faith in their judgment," he said he believes that "there is no more important issue on the Jewish agenda than the question of Jewish unity, which is being deeply frayed by the debate over pluralism."

He called the debate an "ongoing source of despair and a source of divisiveness," one which is "pushing American Jews away from the Jewish state."

The only solution, according to Rabbi Poupko, is to "depoliticize religion in Israel, so Israelis will be able to make their own choices without being subject to rabbinic involvement."

The Reform and Conservative movements, "instead of seeking equality with recognition, should, together with some Orthodox, be seeking to separate and disentangle religion from private religious life in Israel."

He said that "it does Torah no honor to become a political football in parliament – even in a Jewish parliament."

Rabbi Stroh noted that the Toronto Board of Rabbis had already issued a statement "asking the [Israeli] government to get out of the religion business."

Sharansky trying to stop Russian aid to Iran

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky is assiduously working to try to persuade the Russian government to stop providing advanced technology and equipment for Iran's ballistic missile program.

And he is not alone.

U.S. Vice-President Al Gore, with whom Sharansky conferred in Washington on this issue last Thursday, is sending his foreign policy adviser, Leon Fuerth, along with members of the National Security Council, to Moscow to discuss the issue.

And the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations sent a high-level delegation to Russia yesterday in the hope of convincing their Kremlin hosts that they should not be supporting Iran's missile and nuclear development programs.

Sharansky told Gore that time is running out and that if the Iranians are not prevented from completing their weapons buildup within the next 18 months, it will be too late to talk them out of it afterwards.

In that case, the West could be faced with the same dilemma it faces with Iraq's unconventional arms inventory: take the risk of destroying it or accept Iraq as the Arab world's most powerful state.

"The minister's primary goal in seeing Gore was "to clear everything up before the vice-president meets Russian Prime Minister Victor Chernomyrdin March 9," a government official said.

Sharansky expects his next step to be a session in Moscow with Chernomyrdin, during which he will lay out his concept of how Russia can emerge from the shadows cast by the dispatch of missile experts and specialized components to Tehran into the daylight of full integration into the network of democratic nations.

Although his departure date has not yet been set, officials expect it to come within the next 10 days.

They said he deliberately refrained from reiterating his case to members of the U.S. Congress, in the belief that they tend to take a militant position against the Russian-Iranian missile pipeline.

"However, if after March 9, when Chernomyrdin is due to see Gore in Washington, it turns out that his conciliatory strategy did not work, he will go to Capitol Hill and plead his case there," they added.

Although Gore was "very friendly" toward Sharansky, the minister did not lose sight of the fact that the Clinton administration has been much more lenient on the Russia-Iran missile issue than Congress has.

The officials contended that despite Gore's attempts to halt the Moscow-Tehran missile deals, "only two were actually cancelled." They contended that the new technology Russia is capable of giving Iran can help it complete its missile development program and nuclear capability.

"The Russians say Iran's nuclear ambitions are peaceful in nature," the officials said, "but our intelligence is much different." They implied that the Iranians are trying to obtain nuclear arms as well as long-range ballistic missiles with the help of Russian exporters of sophisticated machinery and highly-competent personnel.

decide. The committee was severely critical of "H," Yatom's unofficial deputy and head of operations. "H" resigned from the Mossad several months ago.

Sources close to Yatom said that he would not vacate his post without a fight. It was learned that the Mossad has drawn its own conclusions both in the operative sphere and with regard to specific personnel.

A government source said that Netanyahu will not make any decisions until he has reviewed the report, but added that the prime minister does not particularly want to shake up the Mossad at this time.

However, officials estimate that because the criticism of Yatom is so harsh, the premier may have no choice but to let him go.

The report, produced by El Al chairman Joseph Ciechanover, Israel Electric Corp. chairman and former police inspector-general Rafi Peled and former OC Air Force Dan Tolkovsky, carefully analyses the process of making decisions, both before the failed attempt and immediately after it.

Three of the report's six sections are classified, while the other three relate to the decision-making process, the attempt itself and the subsequent efforts to extricate the agents.

Among the findings:

• Many details of the plan were left vague. Yatom did not get involved in making sure each step was carefully planned, which the committee described as "tunnel vision."

• There were not enough escape vehicles to assure the agents' escape. There were also not enough agents assigned for the attempt to succeed.

• The Mossad did not expect Meshal to be accompanied by bodyguards. The agents, after botching the attempt, did not fight off the Hamas men who chased them and surrendered immediately when they were caught.

The committee had no problem, in principle, with the attempt to eliminate Meshal. Yatom and "H," in their testimony, convinced them that Meshal, officially the secretary of Hamas' political committee, is in fact a senior member of the terrorist organization.

Yatom raised the idea of hitting Meshal to Netanyahu early last year, and Netanyahu gave the green light, but from then, the premier was not involved, leaving the execution of the plan to the Mossad, the committee said.

The committee concluded that in the future, any attempt to assassinate a terrorist leader must be accompanied by regular and detailed reporting.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 9

• Palestinian demonstrations supporting Saddam Hussein became violent and included calls for missiles to land on Tel Aviv.

• Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said that Russia was helping Iran develop chemical and biological weapons as well as ballistic missile technology.

Feb. 10

• Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met jointly in Washington with Dennis Ross. The fact that they had met together did not change observers' glum assessments regarding the success of the talks.

Feb. 11

• David Ktorza, a 40-year-old father of three and a recent immigrant from Marseilles, France, was stabbed to death in his Ramat Shlomo neighborhood on his way to morning prayers. Police feel the killing was politically motivated.

Feb. 12

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel will not rely on Iraqi promises that it will not attack Israel.

Feb. 13

• In a speech to followers, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat threatened that a renewed intifadah will erupt if Israel is not more flexible in its negotiations. He also promised that a Palestinian state with its capital in Jerusalem would arise by 1999.

50 Years Ago

LAKE SUCCESS, Feb. 11 (JTA) — Great Britain notified the UN Palestine Commission late today that 1,400 Arab guerrillas are entrenched in the Samaria district of Palestine and are "increasingly exercising considerable administrative control over the whole area."

The British reported to the commission that on Jan. 29, 700 guerrillas invaded northern Palestine across the Syrian frontier under the command of Fawzi el Kawakji who, the British say, has been assigned to command the Arab Liberation Army. The British note says that the Arabs are controlling the Samarian area "with a surprising degree of discipline...and constitute a cohesive force."

Iraqi crisis simmers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The simmering Iraqi crisis is reaching the boiling point. As diplomatic efforts intensify to avert a war, the United States and its allies are making preparations to strike Iraq.

Mideast Analysis

Backing away from a previous position, Iraq announced it was ready to open eight out of about 60 restricted sites to United Nations weapons inspectors for a limited time. Washington rejected the offer, demanding unconditional and unfettered access to all sites suspected of containing nuclear, biological and chemical weapons of mass destruction and the missiles to deliver them.

As Iraq's foreign minister visited Arab capitals in an attempt to win support for a compromise over this fundamental issue, the Arab League floated a plan designed to bypass the existing inspection system. The United States punctured the trial balloon, calling upon the Iraqi government to accept the authority of the UN inspection regime, which was established in the aftermath of the 1991 Gulf War.

With the Middle East teetering between war and peace, Russia, France and China expressed firm opposition to the military option, and UN Secretary General Kofi Annan got ready to visit Baghdad in a bid to defuse the tension.

Washington and its chief ally, Britain, reaffirmed their preference for a peaceful outcome, but pressed ahead with building a formidable armada in the looming showdown with Iraq. Canada, Australia and New Zealand committed token forces, while Germany and Portugal made their bases available to the United States.

Israel reportedly received assurances from Iraq through Russia that it would not be targeted by Scud missiles again. Israel, though, prepared for worst-case scenarios, and warned Baghdad it would retaliate if attacked.

In the Arab world, ambivalence was the order of the day. Virtually every Arab country opposes the impending U.S. aerial bombing campaign. The Arabs fear that air strikes will generate political instability and kill and maim thousands of innocent civilians without unseating Iraq's leader, Saddam Hussein, or diminishing his desire and/or capacity to acquire an arsenal of non-conventional arms.

But behind these reservations is the resentful perception that the United States is not pushing Israel hard enough for concessions in the Oslo peace process, nor expects Israel to carry out UN resolutions pertaining to withdrawals from southern Lebanon and the territories captured during the Six Day War.

Due to these deep-seated sentiments, and the fact that Iraq has not invaded a neighboring country in this instance, the vast majority of Arab states, as well as Turkey, are reluctant to support military pressure on Baghdad. Only Kuwait (the victim of Iraqi aggression in 1990), Bahrain and Oman, but significantly not Saudi Arabia, have given the United States permission to launch operations from their soil.

The Arabs, however, have reiterated that Baghdad must fulfil all relevant UN resolutions, and that if it does not, Iraq will be held solely responsible for the resulting consequences.

Buckling under protests from Israel and the United States, the Palestine Authority (PA) has banned all further pro-Iraqi demonstrations in the autonomous areas of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, while Yasser Arafat has urged Iraq to comply with its international obligations.

Arafat's advisor, Nabil Abu Rueineh, said recently that the PA will use the current tension in the Persian Gulf to wring concessions from Israel in the peace process. His declaration came on the heels of reports that U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had asked Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to be more flexible so that more Arab states can join the anti-Iraqi coalition.

But last week, following an Israel Radio report that Netanyahu was unwilling to pay that price, Albright scotched Palestinian hopes, telling American Jews that there is "no linkage" between Iraq and the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Tense meeting in Australia of world Maccabi officials

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY— A delegation of officials from the Maccabi World Union (MWU) were greeted with anger and tension at a meeting with Australian Jews last week about last summer's Maccabiah Games bridge tragedy.

Speaker after speaker criticized the organizers of the Maccabiah Games at the meeting, which was attended by close to 150 members of the Australian Maccabiah team, their families and friends, and community leaders.

There were also calls for officials of the international sports body to resign, pending a judicial inquiry.

MWU President Ronnie Bakalarz and the organization's chair, Uzi Netanel, maintained they bore no responsibility for last July's bridge tragedy. Four Australians died and dozens were injured when the bridge collapsed during the Games' opening ceremonies.

Weizmann professors awarded Wolf Prize

REHOVOT — Profs. Michael Sela and Ruth Arnon of the Weizmann Institute of Science have been jointly awarded the 1998 Wolf Prize in Medicine.

The prize committee announced that Sela and Arnon are being honored "for their major discoveries in the field of immunology."

In citing their achievements, the committee noted that the two scientists were the first to introduce synthetic polypeptides, or protein fragments, into immunological research. Through their concept of synthetic vaccines, they paved the way for the production of safe and effective vaccines against infectious diseases, as well as specific peptides for autoimmune disorders.

The prize committee also cited Sela and Arnon for developing Copaxone (copolymer-1), a new drug for the treatment of multiple sclerosis.

The Wolf Prize, which is bestowed annually for outstanding achievements in agriculture, chemistry, mathematics, medicine, physics and the arts, and involves an award of $100,000 (US), will be presented to Sela and Arnon by President Ezer Weizman at the Knesset on May 10.

Two other Weizmann Institute scientists are previous recipients: Prof. Leo Sachs (1980) and Prof. Meir Wilchek (1987), also for achievements in medicine.

Sela, who holds the W. Garfield Weston Chair of Immunology, is deputy chair of the Weizmann Institute's Board of Governors and a former president of the institute, where he has worked since 1950. He has won numerous prizes and awards for his research.

Arnon, who holds the Paul Ehrlich Chair of Immunology, is a former vice-president of the Weizmann Institute, where she has worked since 1960. She has received numerous prestigious awards.

The Wolf Prize is awarded by the Wolf Foundation, which was established in 1976 by the late Dr. Ricardo Wolf, an inventor, diplomat and philanthropist, and his wife Francisca Subirana-Wolf, for the purpose of promoting science and art for the benefit of mankind.

The first Wolf Prize was awarded in 1978. A substantial number of Wolf Prize laureates have subsequently been awarded Nobel Prizes, most recently Stanley Prusiner in 1997 for achievements in the field of medicine.

ABOUT NUTRITION

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I find it hard to get my family to eat vegetables. Do you have any tips?

A. I think the key is to flavor the vegetables with a taste that your family likes. Don't disguise or hide them. For example, I steam brussel sprouts until fork tender and then drizzle them with maple syrup. The sweet syrup takes away the bitter flavor of the brussel sprouts. Your family will love them.

Q. I enjoy eating duck but I know that it is a much less healthy choice than chicken. Can you fill me in on the facts?

A. Duck does have more fat and calories than chicken. One hundred grams of a white meat, skinless chicken contains 173 calories and 4.5 grams of fat. One hundred grams of skinless duck contains, 201 calories and 11.2 grams of fat. The calorie difference is negligible but the fat is about double.

Q. I love making sour cream coffee cake. I have been wondering if I can reduce the fat in this recipe by using the new low fat and fat free sour creams?

A. Yes. These low fat and fat free varieties can be a great substitute to the full fat sour cream. I use one percent yogurt in my sour cream coffee cake.

"Charitable annuities" will provide great income yields

Creative Planning Financial Group is a unique organization, operating in the financial planning industry. Sheldon Taerk, Mel Gilbert and Don Morrison incorporated Creative Planning in 1971 to facilitate estate and succession planning. In 1997, Charles Berger, Richard Cooper, Robert Franklin and Andrew Prenick became shareholders in the parent company, Creative Planning Corporate Insurance Services Inc. These new shareholders represent the future growth of the firm, together with associates Ken Gilbert, Paul Barron, Caroline Nemeth and Jan Russell. The members of the firm have had a long standing involvement in Toronto charities, including Mt. Sinai Hospital and United Appeal & United Jewish Welfare Fund.

Creative Planning associates maintain a high level of competency and technical ability. We are able to provide a total financial plan for clients reaching retirement, as well as for those still building their practices and businesses.

A new interest in life insurance products has developed since the recent budgets have changed the treatment of charitable gifts. Many of our clients are taking advantage of the new rules by leaving proceeds of life insurance through their estates to charities, which reduces the tax payable at their death. Why not use life insurance to benefit your charity instead of Revenue Canada?

Alternatively, "charitable annuities" may be arranged to provide excellent income yields for the annuitant, while making significant gifts to their charity. For example, an 80 year old male donor could give a charity $60,000, receive $5,000 annual income for life and receive a $15,000 charitable receipt. This represents an after-tax yield of 8% and a substantial tax deductible gift to charity.

Security and Growth in Uncertain Times

There's a lot of uncertainty in the marketplace — Asian meltdowns, our sinking dollar, Middle East unrest, and scandals in Washington. It's no wonder investor's are concerned with safety of principal and want performance that is superior to low-yielding GIC's.

Equity-Linked Notes are "bond like" instruments where you are returned 100% of your investment if you hold them to maturity. They have a maturity date, so the investment comes due in the future like a Government of Canada bond.

Unlike bonds however, there's no coupon, instead their performance is linked to an underlying stock market index like the S & P 500, the TSE35 or a basket of international stocks. Issued by Crown Corporations, they are guaranteed by the Federal government. There is no currency risk and no on-going management fees plus you can sell them at any time. Finally, they are considered Canadian content so you can exceed the 20% foreign content rules.

Guaranteed Investment Funds (GIF) is a Manulife product that combine the growth potential of mutual funds with the security of a deposit guarantee. The GIF has a 10-year deposit guarantee at maturity, and even a guarantee upon death. You can protect your initial investment and even lock-in gains while resetting the maturity date. These funds also have estate planning advantages and may provide creditor protection.

How you can profit from lower interest rates

If you are concerned about how today's low interest rates affect your investment performance, you are not alone. The interest rate on mid-term fixed-income securities, for example, has fallen to just above 5½%. That works out to about 3% after taxes, and less than 2% after inflation.

This current down-trend in interest rates is not merely a function of monetary or fiscal policies. Instead, it results from wholesale changes in the population, the baby boomers.

Supply is dwarfing demand for money in capital markets and rates of return on fixed income investments are being driven down to levels not seen since the 1950s.

It is precisely because this trend is expected to continue that all Canadians must address how they will adapt their saving and investing behavior to assure their ability to capture returns needed for financial independence.

How to survive - and thrive - in a lower interest rate environment. Low interest rates, today and in the foreseeable future, are going to continue to challenge Canadian savers. 90 day Treasury Bills, which paid 17.7% in 1982, are currently yielding 4.70%.

Reality today demands a reassessment of risk and risk tolerance. Over the longer term, spreading your risk over different types of investments can protect your purchasing power. Investing in stocks would have yielded superior returns over the past 40 or so years. Indeed, stock market performance superseded fixed-income returns, even through the exceptional early '80s.

Armed with professional advice, and a comprehensive plan that addresses your specific investment needs and goals, you can thrive in this lower interest rate environment. Helping you build your future worth is what we do at TD Evergreen. Call us today.

The Truth About Reverse Mortgages For Seniors

Eligible seniors aged 62 or better can get from $30,000 to $300,000 non-taxable cash from their estate.

The Canadian Home Income Plan is known as a reverse mortgage because no repayments are required during the homeowner's lifetime. Instead, the principal and interest is repaid from the estate or by you, should you decide to sell.

The benefits of a reverse mortgage are many. The money is from your principal residence, so there are no capital gains tax paid. There's no need to sell your home to get the money you want. You remain in the home you love and retain title. You can move at any time and even rent the property if you like. If you are receiving income supplements, this program does not affect this income.

The program could give you a monthly non-taxable income for life, extra cash or a combination of both.

Many clients use this program for estate planning to pass on early inheritance to their children. Other clients use the money for lifestyle enhancement for travel, home renovations, or home help.

To find out how Canadian Home income Plan can improve your life, call toll free 1-800-563-2447 for a free information package. Or write to Canadian Home Income Plan #600-45 St. Clair Ave. W., Toronto, Ont. M4V 1K9.

Music teacher shifts gears, takes up ventriloquism

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Judy Shier recently gave up her job as a recorder teacher to pursue a full-time career as a ventriloquist/writer and healer.

"If you had said a year ago that I would be quitting my job and performing as a ventriloquist, I would have thought you were off the wall," Shier, 42, said recently.

On Feb. 22, she will be performing How the Skunk Lost His Colors (and gained his smell), her original fable on beauty and envy, in the 20th annual Toronto Festival of Storytelling Week.

Three of her plays have Jewish themes. There are Chanukah and Purim stories, and she recently completed a new show in honor of Israel's 50th birthday.

The mother of two sons aged 9 and 13, Shier said there have been many "twists and turns" along the career path that led her to become a professional ventriloquist.

Judy Shier with her stage friends.

She initially worked in the business sector in Israel as a human resources specialist. Overseas, she said, she "rediscovered music," and when she returned to Canada in 1981 she enrolled in the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto.

As a music student, she taught recorder privately and when her oldest son was in school full days, she began teaching for the Toronto Board of Education.

"I really loved being involved in music," she said. "I was happy I could combine this love of music with work."

Seven years ago, Shier took out a library book on ventriloquism and discovered she could do it with ease, she said. "I think it's because I'm a recorder player."

Around the same time she also began writing children's stories.

She surprised her family by performing at their Chanukah party, she said. "The family couldn't believe it. They really liked it. This performance became an annual family tradition at Chanukah and that's where I thought it would stay."

Two summers ago, she had an idea for a Purimspiel and having taken a year of absence from teaching to study healing and to write, she had time to develop the Purim script, she said.

That play debuted last spring at The Centre Spotlight Cafe at the Morris Winchevsky Centre. Shier also began to get other bookings for the show, she said. "People came up to me as if performing was what I did professionally."

By chance, she also found a skunk puppet, and she realized she could tell her fable, How the Skunk Lost His Colors, as a ventriloquist performance.

"I took it into two public schools last spring and it went really well."

Last Chanukah she had eight bookings for her show, Surprise Attack: The Glow Worm's Chanukah and now she's starting to get calls for Purim and Yom Ha'azmaut.

Shier said that although she likes teaching, her job did not afford her enough time to "do more creative things," and she resigned her position last spring.

She has "a file full of ideas" and she hopes to find a publisher for some of her stories, she said. "I love writing, but it's a solitary activity. Performing enables me to bring my stories to life."

For more information about Shier's upcoming performances, call 416-781-5807.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fourth annual Purim Art Contest and we are looking for drawings about Purim from students in elementary school.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 12. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small or too large. Please paint, draw, or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title. Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 27, 1998. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners." The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 6, 1998.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 12, 1998. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

FILM FEST TO HIGHLIGHT ISRAELI FILMS

In its first five years, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival has become a beloved institution, weaving together an audience of young and old, left and right, black hat and bohemian.

The sixth annual festival runs May 7 to 14 this year at the usual venue, the Bloor Cinema, near Bathurst Street. Passes are available at a 10 percent discounted rate of $72, taxes included, from March 16 through April 6. To order, phone 324-8600 or fax 324-8668.

In celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary, the festival is screening three hard-hitting Israeli documentaries.

Michael Karpin's The Road to Rabin Square is a sensational rendering of the calamitous events leading up to the Rabin assassination. Ilana Tsur's The Last Transfer focuses on the difficulties that Holocaust survivors faced in Israel after the war. Dan Katzir's Out For Love... Be Back Shortly is an award-winning student film that tells a love story against the backdrop of the fears of ordinary Israelis during times of terrorism.

All three directors will attend the screenings of their films. Festival organizers expect to announce the inclusion of more Israeli films shortly.

Violist Rivka Golani to perform

TORONTO — Sensational violist Rivka Golani will perform a concert in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary on March 2, 8p.m. at Beth Tikvah synagogue.

Golani is recognized by many as one of the greatest violists of all time. Her contributions to the advancement of viola technique have already given her a place in the history of the instrument and have been a source of inspiration to many composers and players.

More than 200 pieces have been written specifically for her of which 30 are concertos, a record matched by no other violist in history.

Golani performs as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, Royal Concertgebouw, Israel Philharmonic, Montreal Symphony and many others.

During this season, Golani is expected at several appearances in Toronto including a Feb.26 performance for Music Toronto where she will perform world premieres of two chamber music works. On June 13 she will perform and record with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and Jukka Pekka Saraste a viola concerto written for her by Chalmers Award winner Peter Paul Koprowski.

Her March 2 performance will consist of Jewish composers' works and she'll be accompanied by Canadian pianist Bernadene Blaha.

Tickets are $18 and are available from the synagogue office at 22-3433.

Former shaliach leads highway consortium team

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For three years as a shaliach of the Israel Aliyah Centre here, Udi Savion encouraged hundreds of Canadians to move to Israel.

So the least he can do now is build a highway for them, Canadian-style.

Savion plans to do just that, as general manager of Derech Eretz Ltd., the consortium led by Canadian Highways International Corp. (CHIC), which was recently awarded the bid to construct Israel's first toll highway (CJN, Feb. 5).

The project plans to build an 86-kilometre long, four-lane highway from just west of Jerusalem through the outskirts of Tel Aviv to about halfway to Haifa. It will be Israel's first open-road, all-electronic toll highway, modelled on the first such road in the world — Highway 407, just north of Toronto.

As Toronto's aliyah shaliach from 1993 to 1996, Savion watched CHIC build the 407, and he served as unofficial liaison between Israel and the company while Israel considered bids from around the world. Once the Canadian-led group was awarded the contract, he was a natural choice to head the team, given his background in project management.

The $1.1-billion (Cdn) Cross Israel Highway will be Israel's most western-style artery and will help relieve congestion around Tel Aviv, Savion told The CJN in an interview when he visited Toronto last week.

"It will provide better access to Tel Aviv, and it will spread the population out better to the south and north."

The road will use video imaging and transponders, like the 407. Israelis might object at first to paying for the road, Savion says, but police will have the authority to impound cars whose drivers don't pay their bills.

The Israeli highway will probably include added safety features, given that Israelis tend to be more aggressive drivers than Canadians.

But the big difference is that the Israeli highway will be made of asphalt, while the 407 is concrete.

Annual revenue from tolls is projected at $65 million in the first full year of operation. Savion says between 30,000 and 40,000 cars are expected to use the road daily, a number that will eventually climb to 100,000 a day.

The highway is to be built in five sections, beginning this July at either end and ultimately linking in the middle. The first section is slated for completion in September 2000, and the full highway should be open by December 2002.

Udi Savion

At least three environmental groups in Israel want assurances that the road will have minimal effect on wildlife and the landscape. Savion promises their concerns will be addressed. And villagers whose land was expropriated for the highway have been offered generous compensation, he adds.

The Canadian-led consortium will design, build and finance the highway (financing will be all private) and plans to operate it as a toll road for 25 years.

The project will keep Savion busy for years. The Derech Eretz team includes 37 Israeli firms providing services in engineering, law, finance, quality assurance, environmental consulting, and PR and marketing.

The CHIC-led consortium is comprised of Africa-Israel Investments Ltd., one of the largest land developers in Israel; Société Générale d'Entreprises of France, an infrastructure constructor; and Hughes Transportation Management Systems, the toll supplier for the 407, which will provide tolling technology for the Cross Israel Highway.

In all, the project will generate 5,000 direct jobs during construction, 10,000 indirect jobs in support industries and 55 permanent jobs once the highway opens.

Savion had high praise for Ontario Premier Mike Harris, Attorney General Charles Harnick and former transport minister Al Palladini for lobbying on behalf of the CHIC bid. The whole affair, he said, has been "a love story" between Canadian Highways and Israel.

Show profiles Israeli writers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Last week, in honor of Israel's approaching 50th anniversary of statehood, Writers & Company began airing the first of five consecutive radio programs on the literary scene in Israel.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation series, hosted by Eleanor Wachtel, is called Writing A Nation: Israel at 50. It runs until March 15.

Taped largely on location in Israel, the show profiles some of Israel's most notable novelists, poets, essayists, journalists and critics, ranging from Amos Oz to Amos Elon.

But inexplicably, several heavy weights are left out – A.B. Yehoshua, Aharon Appelfeld, Yehuda Amichai and David Grossman.

Their exclusion, though regrettable, does not affect the quality of the series, a sampler of which the CBC made available to The Canadian Jewish News. A cross-section of Israeli writers are featured on this cassette: Meir Shalev, whose novels draw on biblical themes and Israeli mythology; Naim Araidi, a Druze poet and teacher who composes his verse in both Arabic and Hebrew; and Hannah Bat-Shahar, whose husband is an ultra-Orthodox rabbi.

Born in 1948 in Nahalal, Israel's first moshav and also Moshe Dayan's birthplace, Shalev reflects the humanist tradition in Israeli literature.

He discusses the early Zionist pioneers, particularly those of the fabled Second Aliyah (1904-1914). He discloses that both Nahalal and his parents are sources of his inspiration. He expresses concern that education and culture are not government priorities. He worries about the growing power of the Haredim.

Araidi, whose work explores the identity problems of Israeli Arabs, was born in 1950 in a village in the Galilee without electricity or running water. He was educated in a Jewish school in Haifa, served in the army for three years and completed a doctorate degree in Hebrew literature.

Vividly recalling his childhood, Araidi remembers his first exposure to Jewish society and his efforts to master Hebrew, which he describes as a "beautiful, holy" language. Commenting on his status as a Druze, he observes that his community is fully accepted by neither Jews nor Muslims, and that Israeli Arabs feel excluded from mainstream Israel.

Bat-Shahar, whose name is a pseudonym, was born in 1944, and raised in a strict Orthodox household. Haredi Jews reject the secular world, but Bat-Shahar's mother let her read 19th-century European novels (though not 20th-century Hebrew literature) and encouraged her to write and to attend university. At 26, when she already had four children, Bat-Shahar published her first story.

She leads a double life, since her insular community frowns upon female writers and remains closed and secretive. She openly admits that her husband is not enamored of her other life and that he has yet to read any of her stories. In closing, Bat-Shahar hopes that her fiction may shed light on haredi Jews, who, she confesses, feel beleaguered and like a minority.

Writing A Nation, which is broad in scope, insightful and never less than interesting, can be heard on Sundays at 3 p.m. in eastern and Atlantic Canada, 5 p.m. in the west and 3:30 in Newfoundland.

Oscar hope for Holocaust film

BY TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — A film produced by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre has been nominated for an Academy Award in the documentary feature division.

Through archival footage and interviews, The Long Way Home dramatizes the fate of post-Holocaust refugees between 1945 and 1948 and recounts their desperate attempts to reach the Jewish homeland.

The Long Way Home* was written and directed by Mark Jonathan Harris and produced by the Wiesenthal Centre's Moriah Films division.

The centre's first production, Genocide, won an Oscar for best documentary in 1981.

The Academy Awards are scheduled to be announced March 23 in Los Angeles.

Israel & the Jewish World

Futility of hiding behind gas masks

By EFRAIM INBAR

Opinion

Once again, Israel faces the prospect of being attacked by Iraqi missiles armed with non-conventional warheads. We know with near-certainty that Iraq succeeded in maintaining such a capability despite the continuous efforts on the part of the UN inspection teams to dismantle the Iraqi biological and chemical weapons program. In all probability, Iraq still has also a few missile launchers and Scud-C missiles with the necessary range to hit Israel if deployed in western Iraq.

In light of this predicament, Israel is spending millions of dollars on providing a modicum of safety to all its citizens by equipping them with gas masks and by instructing them to create sealed havens in their homes.

This is the only country in the world taking such comprehensive measures. The rationale of 1991 was simple – the state has a responsibility to defend its citizens.

But this is the wrong policy. It was primarily the result of the weakness of Israeli leaders who gave in to populist demands. The expensive defensive efforts are strategically dangerous. The overall nonchalant deja vu attitude toward threats of mass destruction directed at the Jewish people at the end of the 20th century is appalling.

With our own hands we are eroding the threshold between conventional and non-conventional weapons; our defensive measures signal to the Arab rivals that a non-conventional attack on Israel is not unthinkable and that it is even acceptable, provided that casualties are limited in number.

Moreover, we enter an extremely costly race of continuously having to prepare suitable defensive equipment in response to the development of new warheads carrying chemical or biological agents.

Today's protective gear could become obsolete in a short time. In addition, the recurring pictures of hysterical Israelis standing in line to get their gas masks project an image of a weak society incapable of withstanding the rigors of protracted conflict.

The policy of defending the civilian population by passive measures, such as gas masks and masking tape, is a strategic folly and should be discontinued.

Israel must make clear to all its regional rivals that crossing the non-conventional threshold is totally unacceptable, and would trigger disproportionate Israeli retaliation.

Declarations are not enough. They must be reinforced by demonstrations of capability and determination to exact a high price from those who challenge Israel by force.

As Israel's deterrent power is being eroded by a series of military enterprises of questionable record such as the Lebanon war and the intifada, the IDF and other security organs must re-establish a reputation for ruthless efficacy in dealing with foes.

In contrast to popular image, Arab leaders are not irrational. Even Saddam calculates his actions, though we might bemoan his tendency for taking risks. He also ponders the question of what he can gain from launching missiles armed with non-conventional warheads against Israel.

IDF soldier instructs child on the use of a gas mask. [Israel]

The problem Israel faces in deterring aggression is not the rationality of the Arab leaders, but their low sensitivity to cost. They do not care if their goals are achieved at the price of thousands of casualties.

Simply destroying many targets from the air will not create deterrence. The Saddams and the Assads are definitely better equipped than the democratic countries to survive a CNN-televised carnage.

Therefore, Israel has to develop the intelligence ability to identify the targets that are dear to Saddam and his ilk, and the capability of hitting and destroying them.

Examples of such targets in Iraq are the hiding places of the chiefs of the security services and the senior officers in charge of the Republican Guards. These organizations are the mainstay of the regime, and their leaders and those close to them should become the appropriate target.

Precision attacks from the air or by commandos are necessary to eliminate these important targets. If we or others in the free world want to be secure from non-conventional blackmail, there may be no choice but to revert to threats and/or actual political assassinations.

At present, Israel's options for exacting a cost which is meaningful for Saddam are limited. Israel's punitive tools seem to be just as blunt as those of the Americans. They must be honed. Investing in intelligence and in offensive capabilities is wiser than buying gas masks. It is not too late to revert to a sounder strategic policy. Hopefully, our political leaders will have the courage to lead and convince the hysterical mobs of the futility of hiding behind gas masks.

The writer is associate professor of political studies at Bar-Ilan University, and director of its Begin-Sadat (BESA) Centre for Strategic Studies.

Israelis field three athletes in Olympics

By STEVE LIPMAN
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — Hardly a power in the Summer Olympics, Israel is belatedly becoming a player in the Winter Games.

Four years after Israel sent its first one-man team to the Winter Olympics, the Israeli Winter Games team has grown to three athletes.

Ukrainian-born figure skater Misha Shmerkin, Israel's original Winter Olympian at Lillehammer, Norway, in 1992, was joined by ice dancers Sergei Saknovsky, a Moscow native, and his partner Galit Chait, a sabra who grew up in Paramus, N.J. They were feted at the home of President Ezer Weizman prior to their departure for Nagano, and interviewed on Israeli television, which for the first time will be sending a crew to the Winter Olympics.

At this early stage of Israel's participation in the winter event, recognition rather than medals is the goal. The Mediterranean country, which has iced a hockey team that has competed internationally for several years, may send speed skaters and "in theory," skiers to the 2002 Winter Olympics, says Judith Javor, an assistant to Yossi Goldberg, the mayor of Metulla and president of the Israeli Figure Skating Association. The northern border city is home to the Canada Centre, a recreational facility that includes an Olympic-size rink.

The success of Shmerkin, who consistently has ranked among the world's top 20 figure skaters in the last four years, and the medals won by Israelis during the last two Summer Olympics have put the country's Winter Olympians on the athletic map at home and abroad.

Misha Shmerkin

After Shmerkin finished a respectable 16th at the 1992 Games, the Israel Olympic Committee started to include other potential Winter Olympics athletes, some half-dozen skaters, in its budget, Javor says.

"They see Misha as a role model."

Interest in the Winter Olympics, she adds, "has definitely picked up." Israelis are very proud that more of their people are participating, despite the lack of significant corporate sponsorship in Israel.

"Misha doesn't have any [corporate] labels on his costume," Javor says. Finances limit the number of overseas competitions Israeli athletes can attend. "It takes a lot of money to take a skater to a competition."

Goldberg has played a major role in popularizing skating in Israel and in raising funds for the construction of the Canada Centre. The rink, built by the municipality with the support of the Canadian Jewish community, is the site of popular skating classes attended by students from nearby schools and from southern Lebanon, Javor says.

"We have good trainers, we have good coaches – all Russians," she says.

The growing success of coaches and athletes from the former Soviet Union serves as an attraction – "a bridge between the two cultures" – for some Jews in the now-independent republics, Javor says. And several immigrants are employed at the half-dozen ice rinks that have been built in Israel in the last decade.

The results are in for Israel's Olympic figure skaters. In men's singles, Misha Shmerkin finished in 18th place while the ice dance team of Sergei Saknovsky and Galit Chait were 14th.

Skaters get pep talk from Netanyahu

By STEVE LIPMAN
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — It was a match made in Moscow that ended in Nagano, Japan, – with some time in Paramus, N.J., in between.

Sergei Saknovsky, a Moscow-born ice-dancer who had competed for Russia, needed a new skating partner 3½ years ago. So did Galit Chait, living then in Paramus.

Their coaches made the shidduch. Saknovsky came to the United States for a week.

"We tried out. We clicked," says Chait, who was to skate with Saknovsky for Israel in the Winter Games in Nagano and, they hope, again in four years. They are to perform to "traditional" Israeli music.

Chait and Saknovsky stopped in Israel en route to Japan the week before the Games for a pep-talk with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and some last-minute training at the country's ice-skating rink in Metulla.

The 22-year-olds, who have trained in Rockland County and at the University of Delaware under the tutelage of Olympic champions Natalia Linitchouk and Gennadiy Karpanosov, qualified for the Olympics at a recent competition in Austria. They are ranked 18th in the world and were 12th in the last European championships.

The decision to represent Israel was both practical and patriotic, says Chait, who holds dual American-Israeli citizenship. Chait, 5 feet two inches tall and 98 pounds, was born in Kfar Saba to Russian olim who moved to the United States in 1976 and settled in New Jersey.

Fluent in Russian, which she speaks with Saknovsky, she returns "often" to Israel for training in Metulla and for family visits. Israel, with a brief history in winter sports, offers a "greater opportunity to skate in international competition," Chait says. "The whole country is watching you."

Saknovsky, 5 feet 8 inches tall and 135 pounds, also liked the idea of skating for the Jewish state.

Do they have a realistic shot at a medal?

"Not really," Chait says.

Are they nervous about taking part in their first Olympics?

"A little bit," says Saknovsky, a former world junior skating champion.

"I'm not nervous. I'm excited," says Chait. "I put pressure on myself. I want to skate the best for myself."

She started skating at eight when her parents took her to the rink at Rockefeller Centre. Even at that tender age, she says she "had no fear" of falling. Her parents brought her back to Russia for advanced training. Chait eventually concentrated on ice dancing, which eschews the jumps of competitive ice skating.

"I first started thinking" about the Olympics "when I started skating," she says.

She and Saknovsky have entered a score of international competitions. They won at Skate Israel '96 in Metulla two years ago.

Chait says she and Saknovsky are constantly melding their individual styles to each other. "He has a little bit more romantic style. You're always adjusting."

She has taken off two terms from her psychology studies at the University of Delaware to train for the Olympics. When not in Israel, Saknovsky is enrolled at an athletics institute in Moscow.

Their training regimen is demanding. They work out six days a week for eight or nine hours a day, including ballet and weights. "Basically, we live at the rink," Chait says. On Shabbat, they attend programs at the University of Delaware Hillel chapter and observe Jewish holidays together in Israel.

Chait's parents travelled to Nagano to watch her skate. Saknovsky's parents, who remain in Moscow, watched from there.

Lugers overcome racial taunting

By STEVE LIPMAN
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — Four years ago, a group of neo-Nazis put Gordy Sheer and his luge teammates in the news.

The skinheads taunted Robert Pipkins, the squad's only black member, and attacked Duncan Kennedy in Oberhof, the east German town where the team was training.

Several of the skinheads served jail time for the racist attack. Sheer and Kennedy have since lectured high school students about their experiences.

Today, Sheer and his partner, Chris Thorpe, are making headlines for more athletic reasons. They were favored to win a medal in the Winter Games at Nagano.

Sheer, 26, who grew up in "a traditional Jewish family" in Croton-on-Hudson, and Thorpe, also 26, from Marquette, Mich., finished fourth in men's doubles in the 1997 World Cup season. Winners of 23 medals in 34 races since the 1992 Olympics, the pair could become the first Americans to win an Olympic medal in the sport traditionally dominated by Germans and Austrians.

Lugers steer a sled at speeds approaching 100 miles an hour down an ice-covered track that is four-fifths of a mile long and has a vertical drop equivalent to a 28-storey building.

Sheer became interested in the sport at age 12 during a family vacation in Lake Placid, N.Y., site of the 1980 Winter Olympics.

He and Thorpe have been partners for 10 years and competitors in the past two Olympics. Even as the top-ranked U.S. team in luge, they are relatively unknown in the United States though they were featured at the opening of an All-Star Cafe at Disney World in Orlando last year.

In hockey, Mathieu Schneider is expected to be a mainstay of the American defence.

A 10-year NHL veteran, Schneider will play on his first U.S. Olympic team at Nagano. The New York native is in his third season with the Toronto Maple Leafs after previous stops with the New York Islanders and the Montreal Canadiens.

He was on the Canadiens' Stanley Cup champion team in 1992-93 and was named to the NHL All-Star Game in 1996. Schneider, 5 foot 11 and 192 pounds, was a member of Team U.S.A., which won the 1996 World Cup of Hockey.

A veteran alpine skier, Carrie Sheinberg, 25, is on her first Olympic team after seven years on the American women's team. Sheinberg, 5 foot 7 and 142 lbs., is a native of Port Washington, N.Y.

A slalom specialist, she won two gold medals and a silver in the 1997 Alpine Championships – she placed second in the North American Ski Race standings – as well as winning a gold in Switzerland.

About families

Dear Susan,

I am 15 years old, and I live with my mother and my 10-year-old brother. Recently, my mother has begun to date. My brother is a pretty happy-go-lucky kid, and he seems pretty oblivious to the whole thing. However, I am very worried about what might happen. How can I talk to my mother about how I feel?

Dear Reader,

Thank you for sharing your fears about the fact that your mother is starting to date. As the older brother, your feelings are quite normal and understandable. You seem to be very open about sharing your feelings and concerns with your brother, which is an excellent start. Your next goal should be to have the conversation about your worries with your mom. You may want to prepare for this discussion by writing down the specific questions and concerns that you have. You should also consider the pros and cons of her dating from your point of view. You can go so far as thinking about the absolute best and absolute worse possible outcomes of your mother's dating. Allowing yourself to really think about both sides of the coin is very important.

I am sure your mother will appreciate your sharing your fears and concerns with her. With your help, she will understand why you have mixed feelings and where these feelings may be coming from. Help her to remember what it is like to be 15 and the insecurity and fears that go along with that age. Together, you can explore how your fears about her dating grow out of your own inexperience and insecurity with girls. You should also be very open with her and with yourself about the extent to which your concerns grow out of fear of abandonment and worries that you and your brother won't be as important to your mom as you are now. There is no doubt that you will realize that no matter what happens, you will always be a family and she will always love you.

Don't worry that your brother doesn't seem to feel the same way you do. He appears oblivious because that's what 10-year-old boys typically act like. They are into their own mostly male world, and since he probably shows little interest in girls, it is not surprising that he would not be terribly interested in whether or not your mom is dating. However, there may well come a point when it will start to worry him, and that's when he will need your love and support.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 19 years.

JERUSALEM — Government sources expressed surprise at recommendations issued by Canada and the United States for their non-essential diplomats, tourists and businesspeople to consider leaving Israel due to the danger of an Iraqi missile attack.

"Instead of advising their respective staff discreetly, Washington and Ottawa have chosen to do so publicly while at the same time ignoring the effect this could have on the Israeli public," a government official said, expressing disappointment and regret.

"It makes one wonder if the intention was only to impress [Iraqi President] Saddam [Hussein] with the seriousness of American intentions."

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's communications adviser, David Bar-Illan, issued a statement immediately following the American and Canadian announcements.

"The Israeli assessment of chances of an Iraqi attack on Israel have not changed one bit," he said. "We still consider the likelihood of such an attack as extremely low."

The Canadian government made its recommendation last Saturday.

Referring to a Travel Advisory Report issued by the Department of Foreign Affairs, a press release said it "advises Canadians to defer non-essential travel to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza."

It also recommended that Canadians "whose presence is not essential" consider departure "by the safest means possible."

Canadians concerned about their personal safety were urged to maintain close contact with their embassy in Tel Aviv. Americans also were urged to stay in touch with the embassy in Tel Aviv or consulate in Jerusalem.

An embassy aide said the Canadian government would cover the HEBRON — On Jan. 16, 1997, following protracted negotiations with the Palestinian Authority (PA), the Israeli government gave the go-ahead for the army to redeploy in Hebron. This redeployment left much of the city under Palestinian security control in an area known as H-1, where about 110,000 Palestinians live.

In a smaller area, Israel was given all the responsibility for security and public order, including overall security for Israelis. This area, known as H-2, has a population of 20,000 Palestinians.

Within H-2 are located the Jewish settlements of Kiryat Arba, with a population of 7,500, and Givat Ha'Avot. A small enclave in the centre of Hebron, also within the contiguous H-2 area, has about 50 Jewish families. They live near such historical locations as the Cave of Machpela, the centuries-old Jewish quarter of Abraham, and Beit Hadassah.

The first year of the redeployment has seen an uneasy peace with over 1,400 incidents of stone-throwing, petrol bombs, explosives and shootings. The frequency of Arab unrest reflects the ebb and flow of

Songwriter Dies

MONTREAL — Alex Kramer, the Montreal-born songwriter who wrote hit songs for stars such as Doris Day, Jimmy Dorsey and Bing Crosby, died recently in Fairfield, Conn. He was 94.

Kramer wrote some 125 songs with his wife, Joan Whitney, who died in 1990.

Although he left Montreal for New York almost 70 years ago, "he maintained a definite sense of being a Montrealer," said his niece, Carol Davis. His brother, Samuel still lives in Montreal.

ISRAEL

Chief Rabbi in Morocco

JERUSALEM — Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron last week attended an interfaith meeting in Morocco, where representatives of Judaism, Christianity and Islam discussed ways that their religious leaders can help forge world peace.

The meeting was expected to "condemn all kinds of violence and extremism," Rabbi Bakshi-Doron said.

Widower Files Lawsuit

TEL AVIV — The widower of an Australian athlete killed as a result of the bridge collapse at the start of last summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel has filed a $3.5-million law suit against the Jewish state, the Maccabiah organizers and the builders of the bridge.

The suit, which was filed in Jerusalem District Court, was the second to be filed in Israel by a relative of a Maccabiah victim.

Muslim Student

BEERSHEVA — Aiche Rahmoni, a young Muslim woman born in northern Morocco, is a doctoral student in the Hebrew language department at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

Rahmoni, who has a master's degree in Semitic languages from the University of Madrid, is reportedly the first Muslim student to have come here from Morocco.

New 'Social Covenant'

JERUSALEM — Supporters of an initiative to draw up a new "social covenant" on the religious status quo in Israel presented their proposal to President Ezer Weizman last week. Support for the initiative in official religious circles is limited to the National Religious Party.

Among other things, the initiative tries to distinguish between cultural and commercial activities on the Sabbath, suggesting that places of entertainment remain open, while places of commerce, such as shopping centres, be closed.

NEW YORK — The Jewish Communication Network (JCN) recently unveiled JewishMail, its first full-featured, no-cost e-mail service for the Jewish community worldwide. The service is accessible from JCN at [www.jcn18.com].

Books Damaged by Floods

SAN FRANCISCO — Some 2,000 Hebrew and Yiddish books at a Stanford University library may be ruined as a result of the rainstorms that have pounded northern California this winter.

About 150 students recently worked through the night to rescue books at Green Library from the flooded basement.

Many of the books were in boxes waiting to be catalogued. They were sent, along with other books, to be frozen; later they will be freeze-dried. The process usually leaves books usable.

Survivors Receive Funds

BUDAPEST — At a recent ceremony, Ralph Bloch, chair of the Swiss Holocaust Memorial Fund, spoke to some of the Hungarian Jewish Holocaust survivors who received payments of $400 from the $190-million fund created last year by Switzerland's three largest banks as a response to the furor over Switzerland's role in World War II.

The Hungarian government began last fall to pay monthly pensions to the country's 20,000 survivors. Germany is expected to make its first payments later this year to survivors in the former Communist countries of eastern Europe.

Neo-Nazis Arrested

PARIS — Nine members of an international neo-Nazi network were arrested in France and Britain on suspicion of making death threats against leading Jewish personalities, including Simone Veil, a former French cabinet minister. According to the calendar used by the group, the network lives in the year 109, marking the beginning of the world with Hitler's birth in 1889.

Canadian on UJA Mission

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — Robyn Naiberg, 19, a communications major at Hofstra University, was the only Canadian among 600 students on a recent UJA student mission to Israel. The Toronto native, who serves as her school's UJA on Campus co-chair, said the 10-day trip was amazing. "I would definitely encourage other people to go."

The purpose of the mission was to introduce participants to UJA programs and foster Jewish campus leadership.

Same message but new style from racist groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The face of hate is slick, sophisticated and in a family room near you.

In recent years, racist groups have adapted to changing technology by employing eye-catching graphics, contemporary music and multi-media displays to attract young Internet surfers to their computer Web sites. The result is "an emerging culture of hate online," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, a spokesman for the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC).

Rabbi Cooper was in Toronto last week to fight fire with fire. He announced the release of an interactive CD-ROM published by the SWC, called Racism, Mayhem & Terrorism. The computer disc is an education tool designed to help law enforcement officers, anti-hate groups, community organizations and educators address the question of hate on the Internet, he said.

Hate groups had hit a brick wall in recent years, finding limited exposure and effectiveness through leafleting, rallies and other traditional techniques. About seven years ago, they fastened on the Internet as a new vehicle to spread their message to ever-increasing numbers.

In 1991, the Wiesenthal Centre could find only one racist Web page. By 1998, that number had grown to over 800, Rabbi Cooper said.

Most are aimed at attracting a new audience. Young people using the family computer to find alternative music can, by clicking a few buttons, soon find themselves in a white power site, Rabbi Cooper said.

Once in a site, cyber-surfers can be confronted with very dangerous material. Some sites contain bomb-making instructions in books like The Terrorist Handbook, others feature racist jokes that denigrate blacks and Jews. One Web site, Resistance Records, run out of Detroit by Canadian George Burdi, has sold 50,000 racist CDs, some with lyrics like, "the earth shall inherit the meek," he said.

While none of the material is new – The Terrorist Handbook has been around for 20 or 25 years – the means of distribution is innovative, Rabbi Cooper said.

"It's taken a place in the mainstream of online culture."

Rabbi Cooper suggested the material does have an effect, if not in directly motivating actions, at least in creating a climate for crime. He noted that investigators into three white U.S. soldiers involved in a random driveby shooting of a black couple near Ft. Bragg found a Resistance Records catalogue in one of their lockers.

Following a random shooting of a black in Denver, police called the Wiesenthal Centre for information on skinhead culture as part of their investigation into that crime, Rabbi Cooper added.

Rabbi Cooper gave the Canadian Internet community high marks in keeping racist material off its computer servers. He said Internet Service Providers (ISPs) serve as information gatekeepers and are not obliged to permit racist material on their computers.

"We're not the thought police," Rabbi Cooper said. "We're a human rights organization here to announce that the lunatic fringe have embraced the new technology with a vengeance....This is a wake-up call not only for governments, but for families. Young people should know that even if it comes through the computer, it's not necessarily true."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the SWC, said the Canadian Association of Internet Providers (CAIP) has cooperated in keeping racist materials off its computers, with the exception of FTCNet, a company in Oliver, B.C. The SWC has called on law enforcement authorities to lay criminal charges of promoting hate against the owner of the company, he said.

The Internet is no different than other forms of communication in being required to comply with regulations, Littman added.

Police monitor Internet hate

TORONTO — In the last few years, Det. Dino Doria and Det. Sgt. Mike Federico have noticed a change in the tactics employed by hate groups trying to get their message out.

"They're going to the Internet," Doria says.

"It's replacing hard copy and school recruitment," said Federico.

Doria is the head of the Metro Toronto Police hate crimes unit and Federico is the detective sergeant in charge of the police security section, under which the hate crimes unit operates.

As the top cops responsible for monitoring hate crimes, they've kept a close watch on racist groups.

"I think [they've made] a conscious decision to use the Internet and the popular media," Federico said. "Whether that proves to be an effective tool for racist propagandists remains to be seen. But the fact that it's being used by the right leads us to see that they think it's effective."

While the tactics of racist groups have changed, kids remain the prime target for racist recruitment, Doria said.

Racist groups seemed to come to the realization that if they adopted the skinhead look, they'd have a tough time making inroads with many young people, Federico said. "Now, it's a little softer sell."

DID YOU KNOW THAT MUTUAL FUNDS AND RRSP'S ARE NOT MUTUALLY EXCLUSIVE?

The variety of RRSP options available to all Canadians is truly remarkable.

These days, there is more talk about mutual funds than almost any other investment product. And for good reason: there are very few better long term strategies to choose from.

We recommend that you maximize your RRSP contribution every year throughout your working life, and we currently believe there are too many outstanding benefits to ignore including mutual funds in your RRSP strategy.

➤ Qualified management:

One of the greatest advantages you have with Mutual Funds is that they are managed by professional portfolio managers. The peace of mind alone is reason enough for many clients.

➤ Diversification:

There's no better long term strategy then to spread your risk as thinly as possible. But through portfolio diversification, certain obvious advantages come to light. You can maximize your foreign content RRSP's and optimize your higher risk holdings. This is often a daunting undertaking for private investors. We certainly recommend it be left to seasoned financial professionals.

➤ Convenience:

We find that there's really no investment easier to execute than mutual funds. Transfers, tracking and redemption are readily handled. In fact, you can transfer your RRSP investments between many different funds at any time. And you can contribute small amounts on a regular basis to suit your needs.

➤ Compare the returns:

Compared to GIC certificates and many other RRSP vehicles, Mutual Funds often outperform by as much as 20%, 30% or 40%. Yes, there are risk factors to consider, but I would never recommend a fund outside your comfort level. Each year the flexibility of Mutual Funds improves. Please call today. It's a great time to invest in your future.

A patch of melancholy

I write these words on a grey, overcast day. The covering of clouds hides the blue of the sky across the entire horizon, smothering any possibility of truer, lovelier light peeking through the dull, colorless canvas high above.

I am engrossed in the news, my eyes rapidly coursing over headlines and through countless articles in a handful of newspapers, my ears tuned to the radio.

I feel my mood slipping on a patch of melancholy and I know it's not because of the grey skies or the smothering clouds.

There is a dark, unpleasant familiarity to the news I read and to the newscasts I hear. Two themes dominate: Iraq and Quebec.

* * * * *

As of this writing, there is word of a breakthrough in the discussions between UN secretary general Kofi Annan and Saddam Hussein. Details have not been released, but Annan's staff is suggesting that Saddam has agreed to unlimited access to all the inspection sites. No one is celebrating, however; nor is there yet any palpable sense of relief.

The United States has announced it will not pull back its forces until it has confirmation of Saddam's capitulation to the demand for unfettered access and inspection by the UN of his unexplored weapons hideaways.

Even if true, even if Annan has succeeded in every detail of his mission, I still believe, no doubt along with many others, that we have only achieved a postponement of the inevitable future confrontation. I still believe, no doubt along with many others, that Israel will yet one day be a target – hopefully though, a target that he misses – for his vain, malevolent schemes.

I can fully understand the desire that has been expressed by so many interested and caring people that bloodshed in the Gulf must be averted. But I cannot understand, nor should we ever accept, the attempt to support the case against military intervention by drawing comparisons between the UN's treatment of Iraq and its treatment of Israel. Any such comparison is morally offensive, historically ignorant and factually false. (Please see the editorial on page 8.)

But beyond this spurious and often transparent argumentation is the disquiet and the helplessness I – and all of us – feel, knowing the people of Israel must again fear the rain of missiles from their skies. Even if Saddam has only a limited capability, as many experts say, it may nevertheless be a deadly capability.

It is Israel that waits in tension. It is Israel that prays for a "canopy of peace" over its people.

And yet, in familiar, weird, twisted logic, Israel is vilified by countries in the region and elsewhere as the laggard of the peace process, and thus, by inference, somehow neither innocent of existential blame nor deserving of a protective umbrella against missile rain.

Not one Arab country has spoken out condemning the possibility of such rain. On the contrary, many countries celebrate the possibility. And worse, so do many Palestinians, the very people with whom Israel is accused of being too slow in making peace.

* * * * *

The reference to the Supreme Court on the question of the legality of Quebec's right to secede from Canada unilaterally, without regard to any rules or laws, has concluded.

A decision is not expected for six months or more. But in the seven days since the reference was placed before the court, we have already tasted the wildly bombastic, derisive and mocking response by Lucien Bouchard.

Though totally expected, it was a distasteful pill, nevertheless.

Coincident with the end of the argumentation in Ottawa, the PQ held a two-day conference in Montreal. The premier's speech was, yet again, a screed of polemic and incitement against Canada, a hot iron of falsehoods that he constantly sears into the possibility of reasoned accommodation, into the dignity of fairness and the integrity of truth.

The separatists are singular in their loyalty to democracy. They single it out only for themselves. They refuse to confer onto others the "democratic" rights they claim for themselves. For example:

• The Cree nation will not be part of the separatists' enterprise; but the separatists will not countenance separation for the Cree.

• A majority of Quebecers have twice rejected separation; but there will never be "closure" for the separatists when the federalists are the majority. There will only be "closure" for the federalists when the separatists are the majority. The last referendum will be the one whose results the separatists like, and the ones that have preceded, merely details of history.

One need not be a demagogue to be a sincere separatist. Truth and reason, not falsehood and emotion, should be the hallmarks of the debate over Quebec's, and therefore Canada's future. I wonder, then, why the premier's demagoguery seems so little noticed, let alone challenged by the media in Quebec.

* * * * *

There is no shame in slipping on a patch of melancholy. There is shame, though, in remaining grounded in the debilitation of prolonged gloom, afraid or unwilling to join the inevitable battles of everyday life, which in our case, include standing up for Canada and for Israel.

Standing up, it is easier to see the truer and lovelier light peeking through the covering of grey cloud.

Maccabi official back from Aussie 'lions' den'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A recent trip to Australia has given Maccabi Canada President Roy Salomon a taste of what it's like to play the part of Daniel in the lions' den.

Salomon, along with several other senior officials of the Maccabi World Union (MWU), hosted a heated public meeting in Sydney where members of the Jewish community vented their anger against Maccabi officialdom.

Though tempers often flared during the meeting, Salomon said he believes the Maccabi officials accomplished their mission, at least in part, by opening the eyes of Australian Jewry to the very real concern felt by the international Maccabi community towards their pain.

Australian Jews are angry and bitter over the perceived lack of concern by the Maccabi community over the deaths of four of their countrymen and the injuries sustained by others as a result of a bridge collapse during the opening ceremonies of last summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The tragedy has split the international Maccabi community and prompted criminal charges in Israel against the engineers and builders of the bridge.

In addition, the senior Maccabi official in charge of organizing the games, Yoram Eyal, also faces charges. In recent weeks, two civil lawsuits have been launched in which victims' families are suing the MWU, the engineers, the builders and the Israeli government for negligence arising from the collapse.

Australian Maccabi officials have resigned from senior positions on the MWU board and they have threatened to withdraw Maccabi Australia from the world body.

Salomon himself has referred to the last few months as one of the most serious crises ever faced by the international Maccabi community and he's described the mission to Australia as an attempt to save the MWU.

During the delegation's week-long visit to Australia, they met with the family of Greg Small, one of the athletes killed in the tragedy, they hosted two community meetings, one in Sydney attended by about 150 people and another in Melbourne attended by 75 people. Colin Elterman, whose daughter Sasha is still in hospital with a brain abscess, attended the Sydney meeting with his lawyer, but did not otherwise participate. Elterman has led a campaign for the resignations of all senior MWU officials.

Salomon met one-on-one with Frank Gaensler, the fiance of Yette Bennett, one of the four Australians who died in the bridge tragedy and the MWU delegation also met with senior Maccabi Australia officials to iron out inter-organizational differences.

Salomon said he believes a crisis has been averted in the threatened Maccabi organizational split and that the Australian Jewish community has a better understanding of the steps the international Maccabi organization took in the wake of the disaster. But he said most of the victims' families declined to meet with the group.

The public meeting in Sydney allowed Australian Jews to vent their anger but "a lot of people did not know about the real care and concern we have for the families and about the things we did to try to assist the families," Salomon said, adding the MWU has taken "moral responsibility" for the events of last July.

"In the first part of the meeting, there was a great deal of anger expressed at the MWU," including calls for the executive's mass resignation, he said. "But by the end of the meeting, I was told by people that they understood the situation better."

Salomon acknowledged that his view was not shared by all who attended the meeting.

Elterman, who faxed a response to CJN questions from Australia, said the current MWU leadership "appears incapable of healing the rift created by the tragedy and modernizing MWU."

Elterman said the parents of those killed and injured in the bridge collapse are calling for "an independent judicial inquiry into the affairs of MWU and the stepping aside of the executive during this process so that proper procedures and systems can be implemented to ensure parents can trust MWU with the safety of their kids in the future. The role of the senior MWU executive in the disaster and its aftermath...makes them incapable of being independent in this matter."

Salomon acknowledged that many Australian Jews believe the MWU was at fault for the collapse

Federation names campaign chairs

TORONTO — UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign for 50 co-chairs are businessmen Larry Tanenbaum, part owner of the Toronto Maple Leafs, and now the Toronto Raptors, along with Brent Belzberg, president of Harrowston Corporation.

This fundraising drive marks Israel's 50th anniversary and it is also the beginning of a three-year effort to raise $50 million.

Tanenbaum agreed to serve as co-chair because "UJA Federation is the embodiment of the entire Jewish community and supports community members of all affiliations in Toronto and around the world."

Belzberg looks forward to "building on the fabulous infrastructure that UJA Federation has already created. We will capitalize on this opportunity to do great things for the community and for Israel."

Both Tanenbaum and Belzberg have long associations with UJA Federation. Holocaust museum decision pleases all parties

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups are pleased there will be no Holocaust gallery at the Canadian War Museum, and are looking forward to finding a freestanding site for a full-fledged Holocaust museum in Ottawa.

The dropping of plans to add a Holocaust wing to the war museum was welcomed last week by all parties involved. Veterans groups and Jewish organizations had opposed the gallery, for different reasons, and called for a standalone Holocaust museum, instead of adding a wing to the war museum as part of its planned $12-million expansion and renovation [CJN, Feb 19].

The Canadian Museum of Civilization, which administers the war museum, agreed.

"The Holocaust story can best be told in a separate venue fully dedicated to it," Adrienne Clarkson, chair of the museum's board of trustees, announced in a statement.

The board's decision to drop plans for the Holocaust wing will not affect the expansion of the war museum, Clarkson added.

Veterans' groups, which had argued that a Holocaust gallery would be out of place in the war museum because the event was unconnected to Canada's war experience, welcomed the decision.

So did Irving Abella of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

"It's a win-win," he said. "The veterans get an expanded war museum, and the Jewish community gets an autonomous Holocaust museum. And the government makes peace with everybody."

The task at hand now, Abella said, is to "to keep the government's feet to the fire," and make sure it backs up its commitment with financial support. Ottawa "is willing to pay to find a middle ground," Abella feels.

Estimates for building a Holocaust museum from scratch have ranged from $30 million to $50 million. When plans for the Holocaust gallery within the war museum were announced several years ago, the Jewish community was asked to raise $2 million. A fundraising committee was struck under the leadership of Rabbi Jordan Pearlson of Toronto.

Now, the conventional wisdom is that an existing building will be found. But the community will be asked to contribute, observers agree.

Former Defence Minister Barney Danson, whom Ottawa tapped to find a solution to the predicament, was also pleased with the decision to drop the Holocaust gallery.

"You can't tuck the Holocaust into a corner," he told The CJN.

Earlier this month, the Senate's subcommittee on veterans' affairs heard a week of testimony from veterans, Jewish groups and museum officials. Danson feels last week's decision by the Museum of Civilization will not cancel out the Senate's recommendations, which are due in the coming weeks.

The Senate will probably say the gallery shouldn't go into the war museum, even though it's a moot point now; it might say a Holocaust exhibit should go into the Museum of Civilization; but it will most likely suggest a freestanding facility, Danson said.

Abella said he believes the Museum of Civilization's decision to drop the Holocaust wing will render "much" of the Senate subcommittee's work moot.

Danson said the task ahead is to find a building. "There are many excellent sites in Ottawa, if we can pry them loose [from the government]."

An academic advisory committee, composed of historians, including Abella, Prof. Michael Marrus and Prof. Jack Granatstein, will study the composition of a Holocaust museum, added Danson, himself a Jewish war veteran.

A Holocaust museum will take four to five years to complete. In the meantime, Danson says the war museum's expansion should be completed because the facility is "a disgrace...it's so inadequate."

Privately, Jewish organizations have groused that not only were they not formally consulted, but that the whole affair mushroomed into a needless and emotionally painful mess.

Danson said the plans for the Holocaust wing were "done with the best of intentions by people who didn't know what they were doing."

The Jewish War Veterans of Canada (JWV) had argued in favor of including a Holocaust wing in the war museum, but said it was prepared to have a freestanding museum.

JWV national commander Sam Pasternack said he was relieved that everything is working out.

"It puts an end to the controversy," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) last week called on Heritage Minister Sheila Copps to establish a task force that would examine options for a national Holocaust museum.

Farrakhan tones down rhetoric

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish community leaders are breathing a sigh of relief that a public lecture by Nation of Islam (NOI) minister Louis Farrakhan did not turn into an anti-Jewish diatribe.

Spokespeople for Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights said they were gratified that the Chicago-based Islamic leader toned down his often fiery anti-Jewish rhetoric. They were also pleased that no anti-Jewish written material was made available at the lecture, unlike the situation at Farrakhan's last Toronto appearance 18 months ago.

Farrakhan concluded his "Friendship Tour" in Toronto last week with a news conference and a speech in which he condemned U.S. President Bill Clinton and Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien for sending troops to the Persian Gulf region to confront Iraq's Saddam Hussein.

"This is absolute wickedness, You will be condemned in history for such a blatant act of aggression," Farrakhan was quoted as saying.

Farrakhan spoke before crowds estimated between 1,500 to 3,000 at the CNE Coliseum. Members of the Toronto Police hate crimes unit attended the speech. Earlier, Farrakhan had been cautioned by Immigration officers against violating Canada's anti-hate law. The law criminalizes speech that is intended to promote hatred against an identifiable group.

Police anti-hate squad

Farrakhan has come under fire in the past for vilifying Judaism, calling it a "gutter religion" and referring to Jews as "wicked deceivers," "bloodsuckers" and "the synagogue of Satan."

Farrakhan refrained from that sort of rhetoric during his Toronto speech. "My understanding is that the speech went without incident and we are happy to have heard that," said Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

"Farrakhan has learned to tone it down" so he doesn't violate Canadian law, said Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights.

Prior to Farrakhan's speech, some media outlets reported that Farrakhan's supporters were attempting to arrange a meeting between the NOI leader and Congress officials.

Ronen said Congress would meet with Farrakhan only if he first "unequivocally renounces anti-Semitism" and makes "an unequivocal statement distancing himself from the anti-Semitic statements he's made and admits these were inappropriate and ill conceived. But that wasn't done."

Mock said the League would meet with Farrakhan only if he renounces his previous anti-Semitism. Mock said she was happy Farrakhan stayed away from the type of rhetoric he's employed in the United States, saying blatant anti-Semitic remarks can have an effect on impressionable young people, leading them to believe Jews are their enemy.

Mock and Ronen agreed Farrakhan's influence in Toronto has been limited.

Bill Hobson's fateful path to seeking justice

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the last dozen years, Bill Hobson has dedicated much of his professional and personal life to the goal of seeing Nazi war criminals brought to justice.

Last week, the former head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit revealed the motivations that led him into the field.

When he was a child of six, he explained, his father died and his mother was left to look after him and his two young siblings. His mother soon became ill and shortly after that, "a wonderful woman came into our house, Serena Weiss." She became a close family friend.

As a curious 6-year-old, known as "Shorty," Hobson asked Weiss about the tattoo on her arm. Weiss avoided responding at first, but a year later, the woman broke down and told him the story.

"Shorty, you'll never understand," she said. "They took our clothes off, they put us together as a family and we died together... I crawled out of that pit, hating the world."

"That was my first introduction to the Holocaust," Hobson said.

Hobson told that dramatic story to a rapt group of listeners at a recent program sponsored by UJA Federation's young professional network at the Beth Tzedec Congregation. He was joined by Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee and Bernie Farber, executive director of Ontario region of Congress, in a discussion on Nazi war criminals.

When he got older, Hobson said, he "had to find out what Serena and I cried about that time."

After many years as a senior Justice Department lawyer, Hobson became head of the war crimes unit, established after Justice Jules Deschenes recommended in 1986 that legal action be taken against Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

Hobson headed the unit from 1987 to 1990, and along with his deputy, Arnold Fradkin, scored the unit's only success in having Dutch Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens deported to Holland.

He told the meeting he was forced out of the unit and he blasted the Justice Department for being mired in "lies and subterfuge.

"I want you to know that anti-Semitism existed in the Department of Justice," even during his tenure as director of the unit, he said.

Referring to the Department of Justice as "Nazi Canada," Hobson repeated allegations contained in a lawsuit he recently launched against Justice Department bureaucrats that senior officials advised unit lawyers to ignore denaturalization and deportation as possible legal remedies.

When his subordinates in the unit were instructed to look at stripping suspects of citizenship, "lawyers would say, 'I'm not going to do a denaturalization case. It's beneath my dignity,'" Hobson said.

Bill Hobson

In his Statement of Claim, which contains details of his allegations, Hobson pointed out that no new cases were brought forward for five years after he left the unit in 1990, with one exception, the Grujicic case. And that defendant died before the case could be completed.

Hobson alleged "anti-Jewishness was a deliberate ploy to force Fradkin out of the unit to enable a change in the policy, i.e. to go slow."

In other remarks, Abella surveyed Canada's history of inaction vis-a-vis war criminals. He pointed out that Congress had informed federal authorities in 1949 about Antanas Kenstavicius, the head of a Lithuanian police unit that murdered many Jews. It wasn't until 1996 that Canada launched denaturalization proceedings against him and in February 1997, Kenstavicius died on the first day of his hearing.

A historian at York University, Abella suggested Canada has "one of the most heartless and miserly records in closing doors to Jews fleeing Nazis and opening doors to Nazi killers."

In the post-war years, Nazis and their sympathizers were admitted to Canada because of their anti-Communist bona fides. In 1986 former prime minister Pierre Trudeau explained why he declined to act against war criminals. Trudeau suggested such a step would cause dissension in Canada and turn ethnic groups against each other, Abella said.

As a result of that inaction, Canada has become a refuge for modern day war criminals, he added.

In his address, Bernie Farber criticized the media, who, with a few exceptions, have ignored the issue.

Canadian allays Aussie concerns and has not taken responsibility for the consequences of the tragedy. "It was like someone accusing you of things you weren't guilty of," he said.

The MWU delegation tried to stress that "we are caring people and we didn't desert the Australian community in their time of need."

Members of the Maccabi community visited the injured in the hospital and arranged for funds for the families.

"We fell short" in not writing directly to the families, instead directing correspondence to Maccabi Australia to be forwarded to the families, Salomon said. "We should have written directly and I apologized to Mr. Small and to the public meeting," he added.

Salomon said he believes the visit forestalled the possible withdrawal of Maccabi Australia from the world body. To do this, the MWU agreed to several points, subject to approval from the overall MWU leadership in Israel:

- It agreed to appoint three independent persons to an existing three-person commission that the MWU established. The commission will look into the tragedy as well as the overall workings of the MWU. (Elterman has criticized that commission for not being independent.)
- It agreed to ask Eyal to stand down from all MWU activities pending the outcome of his trial in Israel. Maccabi Australia had asked for his resignation from the MWU.
- It agreed to ask MWU official Ittmar Herman, who headed the opening ceremonies committee, to "step aside" pending the outcome of the criminal trials.

In return, Maccabi Australia agreed to remain part of the MWU.

Not only possible, but necessary

Rex Murphy is one of Canada's outstanding social and political commentators, a journalist who combines striking intellectual insight with fairness, integrity, wit, charm, a love of language and humility. Thus, when he commented on the airwaves recently "I think that's one of the arguments that is almost impossible to answer..." (our emphasis) in response to the statement by Liberal MP Mark Assad that the Arab neighbors of Iraq were not supporting the UN coalition against Saddam Hussein because "resolutions dealing with Lebanon or the Palestinians have not been enforced," Murphy was being sincere not polemical.

In this, the 1998 version of the crisis involving Saddam Hussein, Mark Assad's argument has frequently been raised as a way of justifying the rejection of the use of force against the Iraqi dictator. But not only is it possible to respond to it; it is, indeed, necessary to do so. For very often, depending upon its proponent, the argument is also a cloak for a broadside against Israel. The argument has a number of variations, each implying American, if not Western, hypocrisy. We will discuss briefly only two of them.

One version alleges that the United States is being unfairly selective in enforcing only Iraqi violations of UN resolutions while ignoring Israeli "violations" of UN resolutions. The argument is factually false. The UN coalition against Saddam, on whose authority any current military action would be based, arises from the Security Council resolution ending the Gulf War. Saddam started that war, and he agreed to its end on the specific and precise terms of the resolutions.

The security council resolutions binding Israel regarding the Palestinians are 242 and 338 arising from the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War respectively. Israel is implementing them. Indeed the entire peace process stemming back to Camp David, including Madrid and Oslo, is predicated upon them. Security Council resolutions 425 and 509 apply not only to Israel but to Syria, Lebanon and the Israel-hating terrorists based in Lebanon as well. Israel wants to extricate itself somehow from south Lebanon, but without the active cooperation of the Syrians, it will be impossible to do so. Thus, to point to the displeasure of Iraqi neighbors, such as Syria, at the "selective" enforcement of UN Middle East resolutions, is farcical in the extreme, when it is Syria itself that prevents the full and proper implementation of two of those resolutions.

This version even has a sub-text, namely, that if only the Oslo peace process were advancing more actively, the Arab world would be more supportive of the anti-Saddam coalition. The sub-text attempts to link Saddam's dishonesty and dangerous dissembling with the failing relationship between the Palestinian and Israeli negotiators. But there is no factual, causal, historic or moral link. The collective UN response to Saddam stands on its own merits and cannot be tied to the troubled relationship between Palestinians and Israelis.

A second version of the argument suggests that the United States is being unfairly selective in singling out for destruction only Saddam's arsenal and not, for example, Israel's. This version is a straw man, lacking any intellectual or moral substance.

Only if the arsenal of every Middle East country were to be destroyed, could a case be made for destroying Israel's arsenal as well. Otherwise even to mention Israel's weapons in the same sentence and breath as that of Saddam is to betray bias against Israel. Saddam explicitly agreed to the destruction of his weapons of mass destruction in order to bring an end to the war he began, saving his own life in the process. That he is trying to "rescue" some of that weaponry from destruction is more than a mere violation of an agreement. It is a mortal threat to people and nations of that region. The UN is fully justified in trying to eliminate that threat. This is not an impossible argument. It makes eminent sense.

Rex Murphy, please take note.

"Never again" must have real meaning

Holocaust education seeks to educate our young about the past to prevent future such tragedies from occurring. But do lessons from the past translate into action today?

In 1992, I was a participant in the March of the Living. While marching from Auschwitz to Birkenau, I, along with 6,000 other Jewish students from around the world, vowed "Never again." This vow is echoed in Jewish homes and classrooms around the world.

But when we say "Never again," do we only intend this pledge to be extended to our Jewish brethren? Should the Holocaust not be a lesson that we remember in our treatment of all humanity?

For months now, the media has been inundated with news of the massacres perpetrated against innocent Algerian civilians by Islamic fundamentalists. The violence that has plagued Algeria for the last six years has left over 75,000 civilians dead – more than 1,000 have been brutally murdered in the past month alone. In a recent morning newspaper I was horrified to read of tortures inflicted on the toddlers and elderly of Algeria's small villages.

Slightly over 50 years ago, similar evils were committed against our people in Europe while the world turned away, much as we do now. We comment on the atrocity of the situation in Algeria, but we change the channel or turn the page. Like the majority of the outside world in the 1940s, we choose to ignore and we fail to take action.

In today's era of instant communication, worldwide events are shown to us via TV footage and breaking news almost as it occurs. This was not the case during World War II.

Yet we point fingers at the rest of the world for turning their back on the cries of six million Jews in Europe, while today we too ignore the cries of our fellow human beings in Algeria. As a self-proclaimed "light unto the nations" and especially as a people who have also suffered at the hands of fanaticism, we face a moral obligation to demand an end to the tortures and massacres occurring today.

Recently, European diplomats visited Algeria in hope of obtaining permission for a UN inquiry into the violence. They were rebuffed. President Liamine Zeroual has denounced international expressions of concern about the killing as unacceptable interference in Algeria's internal affairs. So for now, the massacres in Algeria continue.

Finkelstein I

Norman Finkelstein recently protested Ellie Tesher's characterization of him in the Toronto Star as "notorious for 15 years of venomously lambasting Israel," and goes on to sing his own praises accompanied by endorsements from his mother.

Well Tesher was gentle on Finkelstein. As someone who is deeply concerned about justice for the Palestinians, I have come across his writings regularly. Not only is he rabidly anti-Zionist, but he persists in comparing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to the Nazis' treatment of the Jews. To be fair, Finkelstein is also critical of some Palestinians. For instance, he has suggested that Yasser Arafat's signing of the Oslo peace accords makes him a traitor to the Palestinian cause!

Finkelstein II

In your Jan. 29 issue, you have an article, "Historian responds to critics," dealing with the controversy over historian Ruth Birn's publishing a critique of Daniel Goldhagen's Hitler's Willing Executioners together with one by Norman Finkelstein.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Irving Abella is quoted as saying that Finkelstein "is an enemy of the Jewish people" and that for Birn to publish with him, "would be like being published with someone from the Ku Klux Klan."

Such a statement is an outrage, Finkelstein is one of many Jews who are critical of Zionism (in varying degrees) and of Israeli practices toward the Palestinians, while supporting the rights of both peoples.

One may agree or not with Birn and Finkelstein's critique of Goldhagen, and with Finkelstein's critique of Zionism. However, there is no justification for smearing Finkelstein as "an enemy of the Jewish people," and for threatening Birn's career for publishing with him. To compare Finkelstein to the Ku Klux Klan is appalling.

Praising the community's kindness

It seems clear to me that the reaction of the Jewish community to last month's powerful ice storm constitutes a veritable kiddush shaim shamayim.

Our places of prayer, education, administration and health care were turned into shelters with doors open wide on many a dark and frigid night. Families opened their homes, volunteers their hearts, and businesses their wares to help the thousands seriously affected by the critical damage to the city's power infrastructure. Emergency personnel and rescuers worked at high alert around the clock to help their fellow humans in need. Everyone made the direly needed effort to give each other hope.

The public and frequent performance of so many mitzvot and good deeds, with no expectation of physical reward, under such difficult conditions and in conjunction with our Torah institutions, surely makes this ice storm of '98 especially noteworthy.

In the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur piyyut liturgy, we offer vivid contrasts between the way the name of G-d is sanctified in the heavens by supernatural phenomena, as opposed to on earth by human activity. In a sense, these simultaneous occurrences were palpable during the storm.

As the liturgy makes clear, it is the ordinary actions of humans that are truly the more important and impressive.

I would like to thank the entire Jewish community for its major part in the ice storm relief effort.

Feminists discuss their place in Orthodoxy

International conference attracts 2,000

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

What a difference a year makes. For the organizers of the Second International Conference on Feminism and Orthodoxy, the last year has seen major developments.

The year between the inaugural conference, which was fraught with trepidation and nervous excitement for organizers, and the second, which was held recently in Manhattan, also marked a notable change in the way their issues are regarded in the Orthodox community.

At a time when Orthodox organizations and their leaders continue marching to the right on a panoply of issues – from pluralism to the peace process – Orthodox women's calls for empowerment seem to be less controversial than they were even a year ago.

This time around, conference participants and organizers alike were no longer asking whether it was possible to reconcile Orthodoxy and feminism.

This time, they were doing it.

"We're part of the mainstream now," said the conference chair, Blu Greenberg. "We are modern Orthodox, not troublemakers at the edge of the community. This was a very mainstream group."

But given that no major Orthodox organizations sponsored the event – and the one that did last year, Amit, pulled away this year – it was equally clear that this nascent movement is not fully embraced by the Orthodox establishment.

"It doesn't matter that we didn't have their sponsorship," Greenberg said. "There were plenty of women from Amit and Emunah at the conference," she said, referring to two Orthodox women's organizations.

The president of Amit, Evelyn Blachor, agreed. "There were many more Amit members there, including myself, as individuals this year than last.

"As a social service organization which is about helping children in Israel, we didn't think it was part of our mission to sponsor the conference," she said, explaining her group's decision. "We did not want to offend any of our constituents and dilute or pollute our mission."

For his part, Dr. Mandell Ganchrow, president of the Orthodox Union, a large umbrella organization that certifies foods as kosher and represents Orthodox synagogues, said of the conference, "It's a real important area that we're interested in. I have no problem with it."

With 2,000 participants, the conference this year attracted a bigger crowd than most American Jewish religious gatherings. Only the Agudath Israel of America and Reform movement conventions draw larger numbers.

Numbers tell much of the story of how the movement has grown – and how it is moving from being regarded as treif – non-kosher – or at least questionable, to much more acceptable.

Organizers expected about 400 people to attend last year's conference, 1,000 showed up. This year they expected 1,400 – and instead, had about 2,000 participants ranging from adolescents to septuagenarians.

Last year, organizers found it difficult to get "big name" Orthodox rabbis and "mainstream" Orthodox women to participate, other than those who are already most closely identified with the idea of promoting women as spiritual leaders within Orthodox Judaism.

This year so many called the organizers wanting to participate that they had to turn some away, Bat Sheva Marcus, conference co-chairwoman, said during an interview as she nursed her newborn daughter in a room set aside for babies.

This year many more were visible – both in the audience and as speakers.

Prominent Orthodox rabbis speaking included New Yorkers Haskel Lookstein of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun and Adam Mintz of Lincoln Square Synagogue, and Shlomo Riskin of the West Bank settlement of Efrat.

Also speaking at the conference this year were Lubavitcher Henna White, who spoke about The Ultra-Orthodox Woman: Conceptions and Misconceptions, and Rabbi Yosef Henkin, a Jerusalem-based interpreter of Jewish law, who spoke about the ways in which traditional Jewish texts view the subject of modesty.

Last year, conference speakers were warned to stay away from applying the words "rabbinic ordination" to women.

This year, there was a whole panel discussion devoted to the subject.

Lincoln Square Synagogue in New York City recently became the first Orthodox synagogue to announce that it had hired a woman to work as a congregational intern, a sort of para-rabbinic role in which the intern performs those roles permitted to women.

The Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, N.Y., was the second. And two more Orthodox synagogues, one in Oakland, Calif., and one in Stamford, Conn., are in the process of doing so, said Rabbi Avi Weiss, who spoke at the conference.

Sessions included these topics:

- gender and traditional texts;
- expanding women's religious roles in the synagogue and at home;
- reclaiming a mother's name in traditional ceremonies like brit milah;
- pre- and post-nuptial agreements;
- domestic violence;
- creating a woman's prayer group; and
- the views of Rabbi Moshe Feinstein and Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, two Orthodox religious leaders whose interpretations on women's prayer groups, pre-nuptial agreements and divorce have guided current developments in these areas.

Edith Gribetz, 73, of New York City said of her experience at the conference: "It's very exciting for my generation to see the level of scholarship here and the enthusiasm.

"Fifty years ago we didn't think such a thing was possible," said Gribetz, whose daughter, Beverly, is a prominent educator in Israel.

This year, like last, women also came from all over the world – from Australia and England, from Holland and Hong Kong and Israel.

"I came because I wanted to know where the zeitgeist is," said Sally Berkovic, who came from a suburb of London.

"I also wanted to have my own feelings reaffirmed by other women, because I feel intellectually isolated in England, which is much more conservative on these issues," said Berkovic, author of Under My Hat, a recently published book about her experience as an Orthodox feminist.

"And I have two young daughters," she said. "I want to know what place there will be for them in Orthodoxy."

'An explosion of women's learning'

Knowledge is power – and Orthodox women are applying the maxim to their lives in unprecedented numbers.

Across the Orthodox world, women are turning to Judaism's most sacred texts to understand for themselves the foundations of their faith.

"It's all over, like poppies pushing up in a winter field," said Rabbanit Chana Henkin.

Henkin founded Nishmat in Jerusalem, one of several institutes created in recent years to accommodate a burgeoning number of Orthodox women who want to learn Judaism's primary texts – the Bible and its codified commentaries.

But while an explosion of Jewish learning among women has created a mini-revolution in the modern Orthodox world, the phenomenon is sparking a backlash in those Orthodox communities most sheltered from the secular world.

Leaders in the most traditional part of the Orthodox world know that access to Jewish texts is a powerful thing. And they fear that such access might tempt their women to alter their time-honored roles as wives and as mothers.

But it's a different story in the modern Orthodox world, where Jews try to mesh their traditional religious and secular lives.

Many modern Orthodox women are seeking the same level of sophistication in their Jewish learning that they are finding at universities, say observers of this trend.

Some 60 Orthodox women's Torah institutes now exist in Israel, according to Rabbi Daniel Sperber, a professor of Talmud at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan.

He was among many speakers to address the issue of Jewish learning among women at the Second International Conference on Feminism and Orthodoxy, held recently in New York City.

Several similar institutes exist in the United States as well, mostly in New York.

When Blu Greenberg, widely known as the mother of Orthodox feminism, said in a speech at the first Jewish feminist conference in 1973 that there should be places for women to study Torah full-time – as there are for men – the idea seemed so far-fetched that people in the audience laughed, she recalled.

Just over a decade later, she began noticing "an explosion of women's learning," she said.

Today, several thousand Orthodox women are learning Torah as a full-time pursuit.

But those women who pursue such a high level of scholarship find themselves facing a variety of vexing challenges – from finding appropriate jobs to finding husbands.

Today some parts of the Orthodox community are trying to find a place for the new population of learned women.

Scholarly women are working in yeshivah high schools, Jewish community centres and at universities.

Still, there are fewer positions than there are women capable of filling them.

A lot of the women in the most advanced program offered by the Drisha Institute for Jewish Education, on Manhattan's Upper West Side, "wonder how they're ever going to get jobs," said one student who asked not to be named.

Meeting men who are undaunted by a learned woman or think at similarly sophisticated levels isn't easy, said others.

"Religiously educated girls have difficulty finding compatible partners," Shira Breuer, principal of the Pelech School, an Orthodox girls' high school in Jerusalem, said in a workshop at the feminism conference.

She cited a former student, now 22, who told her, "You have to do something with boys' education" to bring it up to the level that a growing number of girls are now receiving.

Learning at a sophisticated level remains controversial in many parts of the Orthodox community.

A set of 17-year-old twins attending the conference recalled how inviting classmates over to study Jewish literature on the night of Shavuot got them into trouble.

A teacher told them that only men learn on the night of Shavuot, said one twin, and that girls are "supposed to get their beauty rest so they look pretty for their husbands."

The twins, students at a girls' yeshivah high school in Brooklyn, N.Y., attended the conference with an older sister and their mother, who asked that they not be identified for fear that they would "make waves" at the school.

"I never thought of myself as a feminist, but that's what they're calling us at school for asking questions about Gemarah, so maybe I am," one twin said, referring to the Talmud.

A soldier's story

The story of Nicholai Rappaport, a Russian-born, Israeli soldier who had immigrated 2½ years ago and who was killed last month in a Hezbollah ambush in southern Lebanon, confronted Israelis with several difficult truths, precisely because it was so "media- friendly."

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

The graphic poverty of his family's living conditions, and the sight of his coffin boarding a flight to Russia for burial there at his family's request, are the stuff that television reports are made of.

In Israel, where the personal is so often political, the decision to abandon an Israeli military funeral quickly took on a larger meaning – and with good reason. Nicholai's family may well have made their decision on purely personal grounds, but it cast a harsh light on the particular predicament of thousands of Russians who have gained Israeli citizenship through the Law of Return, and are now a significant minority whose personal status is caught between the religious authorities on the one hand, and the civil courts and bodies such as the IDF, on the other hand.

Nicholai's mother is not Jewish. The Law of Return, with its liberal approach to Jewish identity for the purposes of aliyah, citizenship – and therefore military service – allowed Nicholai to come to Israel, gain automatic citizenship, dream of a new life...and join the army as a "Jewish soldier."

But for matters of personal status, the definition of his Jewishness in Israel was determined by halachic standards, as interpreted by the Orthodox rabbinate, according to which he was not Jewish. In a country where historically there has been no option of civil burial and where all personal status issues are within the purview of religious courts (Jewish, Christian or Muslim, as appropriate), Nicholai's burial in a Jewish military cemetery would have raised difficult questions for the military, as it had in earlier, similar cases. In turn, the IDF is not accustomed to performing a burial with honors in Christian (or Muslim) cemeteries, except for Druze and Bedouin soldiers. To complicate things further, the families of Russian-Israeli soldiers killed in action may not want their sons buried in a Christian cemetery.

In matters of marriage, divorce, birth and death, the new reality of many Russian immigrants who are not halachically Jewish has forced a rethinking of the relationship between religion and state, quite apart from the demands of the Conservative and Reform movements for recognition of their rabbinical bodies in Israel.

The immigrants' issues are real, and they are not necessarily resolved by greater religious pluralism within Judaism. Those who want to go through conversion to Judaism might be helped by a more liberal conversion process, but others prefer to maintain their civil status as is. For a state in which the only significant non-Jewish minority for nearly five decades has been its Muslim and Christian Arab citizens, this poses a new challenge. The number of such Russian immigrants is not accurately known, but in Israel, where combat duty is the highest form of national service and sacrifice, the knowledge that approximately 30 to 40 percent of the soldiers in infantry, the armored corps and the engineering corps are immigrants who arrived in the last eight years (although most of them probably do not have this identity issue), has made the matter more acute.

For the first time in its history, the country may have to find ways to separate its civil track of citizenship, through the Law of Return, and its religious definition of Jewishness, through the rabbinic courts.

One step has already been taken. In 1996, in response to the painful sight of an IDF soldier buried furtively in the corner of a Jewish cemetery, the Knesset passed a law guaranteeing the right to an alternative, civil burial, which allows each individual to be buried " according to his or her world view."

This law enables any Israeli to choose a civil, rather than religious ceremony. If implemented, it will allow for a dignified burial in civil plots for immigrants whose religious status is unclear from a halachic point of view, and whose only formal alternative to date has been a Christian ceremony.

In turn, the IDF's definition of itself as a "Jewish army" may need to be revisited, as its ranks are joined by soldiers who are citizens of the state, even if their "Jewishness" can be questioned by the religious authorities.

Israelis were bothered by Nicholai Rappaport's sad story, as well they should have been. The technicalities of it notwithstanding, it brought home to the public just how great the contribution of Russian immigrants has been to the country's culture, education and national security. Far from the unfair stigma of mafiosos and prostitution rings that are associated with the Russian immigration, this episode touched a raw nerve. Maybe it will make a difference.

Seven is a special number

The significance in our tradition of certain numbers is well known. Seven, 12, 40, 70, 120 are examples, but the pre-eminence of seven in Jewish tradition is undoubted. It begins of course with the very first chapter of the Book of Genesis, which records that God created the world in six days and rested on the seventh – thereby creating the concept of a seven-day week, a concept that has no relationship to natural occurrences like the waning and rising of the moon. Some scholars contend that the ancient significance of the number seven was founded on the fact that people could observe only five planets with the naked eye, and adding the sun and the moon to them, found the number seven inscribed in the very heavens.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

For us, of course, God's sanctification of the seventh day was ample reason to make the number seven very special, and it runs like a thread through the early books of the Torah. Every seventh year was special, for the land itself had to rest and was not subject to seeding and harvest. After the passage of seven times seven years came the Jubilee, when people were to return to their original holdings.

In the life of Abraham, too, the number seven figures in a most unusual fashion. In the 14th chapter of Genesis, we read that Abraham's nephew, Lot, was captured by invading forces and carried away. When this terrible news was told to the patriarch, he assembled his retinue, chased after the captors and managed to free his nephew. That in itself would be an unusual story, for Abraham was otherwise not known to have been a warrior, but it is the number of his retainers that lends added punch to the report.

We are told that the number of his small group of fighters was 318. Why does the Torah record this unusual number? Because it had a special significance that the ancients still understood.

To begin with, 318 was the number of servants that a very rich woman received as a dowry in certain surrounding cultures, and we may conclude that Sarah, Abraham's wife, had been the recipient of such parental largesse. Therefore, when the Torah tells us that Abraham went with 318 fighters to free Lot, it would indicate that he took everything that Sarah had brought into the marriage in order to save his nephew. While we today need such an elaborate explanation, the ancients did not need it, for they were closer to these traditions.

But an additional interpretation is, to me, even more fascinating. Add up all the prime numbers between seven and 49 (7 + 11 + 13 etc.) and you will get 318, which is to say that seven stands at one end of this configuration and seven square at the other.

There are many other instances of this number's occurrence, and they highlight the fact that it had extraordinary significance and so, in fact, did numbers in general. Thus, God was the only one who could give permission for a census, for numbering people was not deemed a permissible human enterprise.

Whatever the case, for us, seven is first and foremost Shabbat, and therefore signifies holiness.

Anticipating Israel's 50th anniversary

The celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary of independence is approaching. By the time this column is published, the Americans may have launched attacks on Iraqi installations. Iraq has apparently decided not to attack Israel, according to one report. One cannot be certain.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

But just the threat of missiles from Iraq has served to make an already sour mood in Israel – according to many reports – even worse. No one wants to celebrate when they are busy with gas masks and masking tape. Even before this crisis, commentators were wondering if the Israeli spirit has been sapped by the constant strain of tension caused by external danger and internal division.

Certainly there is every sign that the internal religious kulturkampf is far from over. The collapse of the negotiations aimed at somehow increasing the stature of Reform and Conservative Judaism in Israel does not augur well.

Equally depressing is the story about the Russian Israeli soldier killed in battle, whose family lived in abject poverty in a one-room hovel in Tel Aviv. His case is one of many in which Russian immigrant families have not found the land of milk and honey. The fact that he was apparently not Jewish according to Halachah added salt to the wound.

But what is puzzling is that objectively, looking at the big picture, Israel has much to celebrate. In 50 years, Israel has become a democratic, relatively affluent society, modern and technologically sophisticated. In the past few years, Israel has renewed and fulfilled the Zionist vision of kibbutz galuvot with the influx of hundreds of thousands of Russian Jews, as well as Ethiopians, though their full integration is not yet complete. Finally, while many secular Israelis feel hostility to haredi Jews and the nationalist/religious settlers, they are not all that concerned with securing equal rights for Reform or Conservative Jews, who remain a relatively unknown quantity. And some are rediscovering the value of traditional Judaism.

So why the (pre-Iraqi) gloom in Israel? One explanation must be the effect of rising expectations. As things get better for any group of people, the remaining inequalities – or irritants – become all the more intolerable. They want still more. Israelis as a whole can feel that things are getting worse when they are in fact getting better.

Similarly, the peace treaty with Egypt, followed by the Oslo accords and then the treaty with Jordan, raised high expectations for a quick and secure peace treaty with the Palestinians, and perhaps even the Syrians. These expectations have now been dashed, at least temporarily. Again, the result is a greater feeling of dissatisfaction.

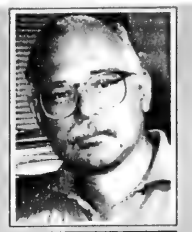
A second, related explanation lies with the reference group with which Israelis compare themselves. It is likely that now the average Israeli compares him or herself to North American Jews, and wants the same level of affluence. Nothing less will do. Similarly, recent Russian Jewish immigrants, and North African Jews who immigrated long ago, compare themselves not with the countries they left behind but with wealthier Ashkenazi veteran Israelis. And they are becoming increasingly impatient, particularly as the economic gaps seem to have widened under Likud policies.

A third explanation may be a crisis of meaning, resulting from the very material successes in Israel. People may, consciously or subconsciously, be expressing a reaction to what seems to be an idealistic void. Israel was founded on an ideal of chalutziut that offered spiritual sustenance to the 80 percent of the population that was non-religious. The swamps have all been drained. "Keeping up with the Cohens" – or the Zionist idea of normalization – may be a poor substitute as a national ethos.

There is always a danger that too much gloom about Israel's future may become a self-fulfilling prophecy. There are indeed real problems in Israeli society – as in many others. Some North American Jews are becoming disenchanted with Israel; but they should distinguish between government policies and the country. Now is no time for Israel's friends to abandon her. The pessimistic perceptions must not overshadow the glorious track record or substitute for a reality that still offers so much that is admirable.

The Kirshner File

The rise of Hezbollah in Lebanon



By Sheldon Kirshner

Hard as it may be to believe, the Israeli army was regarded as a liberating force by many local inhabitants when it invaded southern Lebanon in 1982. Today, at a time when Israeli soldiers are fighting and dying to preserve Israel's self-declared security zone there, it seems incredible that they were once openly welcomed by the Lebanese.

So what happened? Why did the liberators turn into occupiers? Why did southern Lebanon become a morass for Israel? What accounted for the rise of Israel's nemesis, Hezbollah?

To answer these questions, one must examine the socio-political landscape of this convoluted area, as Hala Jaber has thoroughly done in her book Hezbollah (Raincoast), the first in English to focus exclusively on that militant organization. Only then can one appreciate the factors which led Israel to its tragic entanglement in Lebanon.

When Israeli tanks and armored personnel carriers rolled into southern Lebanon 16 years ago in June, they were met by a population, consisting mainly of Shiite Muslims, grateful for having freed them from the heavy-handed reign of the PLO.

Having been driven out of Jordan 11 years earlier, the PLO had established a state-within-a-state in the impoverished south, using it as a base from which to launch attacks against Israel.

Israel retaliated, and the Shiites – the underdogs of Lebanon in terms of economic status – absorbed the brunt of its reprisal raids. No wonder they were glad when Israel ousted the PLO from their midst.

For a while, Israel enjoyed cordial relations with the southern Lebanese. But when they realized that Israel had no intention of making a quick exit from their land, anger and resentment grew, followed by armed attacks, some of which took the form of suicide bombings.

Jaber, a journalist who has covered Lebanon for Reuters and Associated Press, claims the inalterable turning point occurred on Oct. 16, 1983, when an Israeli convoy disrupted a sacred Shiite religious festival in the town of Nabatiyeh.

This incident, resulting in the deaths of two civilians, galvanized the Shiites. The Higher Shiite Council in Beirut called for "civil resistance." The Lebanese National Resistance (LNR), dominated by the secular Amal movement, was established.

As the scope of anti-Israeli attacks intensified, Israel tried to stop the infiltration of Shiite fighters from Beirut and the Syrian-controlled Bekaa Valley by cutting off southern Lebanon from the rest of the country. The tactic not only backfired, but provided the impetus for the official formation of Hezbollah, which until then had worked under the umbrella of the LNR.

Aside from its long-range objective of establishing an Islamic state in Lebanon, Hezbollah's immediate goals were to end Israel's occupation and to drive American, British and French expeditionary armies out of the country. Hezbollah was encouraged and helped by Iran, which promoted Islamic fundamentalist values, and by Iran's ally, Syria, which had clashed with Israel in the 1982 war.

To an astonishing degree, Hezbollah achieved its short-term aims. Foreign forces, battered by a series of demoralizing suicide bombings, left with alacrity. Israel, shaken by escalating casualties in the field, decided to withdraw from all but a chunk of territory adjacent to its northern border.

In June 1985, Israel made its final withdrawal, leaving behind a security enclave policed by the Israeli army and the South Lebanon Army, a surrogate group commanded by a Lebanese Maronite (Antoine Lahad) and consisting of Muslim and Christian recruits.

The withdrawals, demanded by the Labor party component of Israel's national unity government, did not satisfy Hezbollah. The mini- war continued, as it has to this day, exacting a fearsome toll in lives and property.

Regarding Israel as a foreign island in an Islamic sea, Hezbollah is unyielding in its hatred toward its enemy. Indeed, its charter categorically rejects coexistence between Islam and Israel. As its chilling words read: "And so our confrontation with this entity should end only when and after it has been eliminated from existence."

In an interview, Hezbollah's spiritual guide, Sayyed Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, elaborated upon this theme: "Israel cannot be viewed as a state with the right to security and peace just like any other state in the region."

Yet, as Jaber must know but fails to mention, Hezbollah is capable of pragmatism, and does not appear to be opposed to a regional peace agreement which would preserve Israel's right to exist.

Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's operational leader, is on record as having said that he would "close the file on Israel" once the last Israeli soldier leaves Lebanon.

"Nobody can fight for Palestinian land other than the Palestinian people, who resist inside Palestine," he added. "This nobody other than the Palestinians themselves can do."

Military successes

The esteem in which Hezbollah is generally held by Lebanese Muslims stems not only from its battlefield successes. With Iran's assistance, Hezbollah has built an entire social welfare system for the Shiite community. In the past, the Lebanese government, as well as traditional Shiite leaders, woefully neglected the Shiites, one of 18 different religious confessions in Lebanon.

As Jaber explains, Hezbollah has cleverly filled that void by building health-care clinics and schools, and rebuilding homes flattened by Israeli reprisals .

Even so, Hezbollah is not without its enemies. In 1985, with Syria's blessing, Amal attacked Palestinians returning to their refugee camps. Hezbollah came to their aid, and pitched battles ensued. A truce patched up their differences, but the animosity remains.

Just two years later, Syrian troops attempting to enter Shiite neighborhoods in western Beirut were rebuffed by Hezbollah militiamen. The Syrians opened fire, killing 20 of the resisters. The message was unmistakably clear. Syria would not hesitate to impose its will on Hezbollah.

For Israel, this was an important precedent with future applications. Having gotten tough with Hezbollah once, there is no logical reason why Syria cannot do it again if its national interests are at stake.

Let me explain. Among other conditions, Israel will not pull out of southern Lebanon unless Hezbollah is effectively disarmed. Syria – the preeminent military power in Lebanon – would be tempted to disarm Hezbollah as part of a global peace agreement with Israel in which it agrees to withdraw from the Golan Heights.

The present Israeli government hews to the view that a withdrawal from Lebanon cannot be unilateral, and carried out in a political vacuum. But by the same token, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is intent on keeping the Golan.

Few observers, therefore, are optimistic that Israel and Syria can reach an agreement with respect to the Golan and Lebanon. That being the case, even fewer analysts believe that Hezbollah will cease its increasingly effective military campaign against Israel in the security zone.

And so, with a new year having begun, the fighting rages on in Israel's last active war front.

Rabbinic Reflections

Unify Jewish people

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

The dramatic moment of divine revelation at Mount Sinai marked the formal foundation of the Jewish religion with its common demands and goals. After being forgiven for the terrible sin of worshipping the Golden Calf on Yom Kippur, the next day they were commanded to establish the first house of worship, the Mishkan or Tabernacle in the desert.

This week's scriptural portion, Terumah, calls upon the children of Israel "to take for Me an offering." Rather strange – it should say give an offering. Part of the answer lies in the fact that this past Sabbath was called Parshat Shekalim. This was the command made to every adult that they must contribute half a shekel for the census as well as maintaining the services of the Tabernacle, later on the Holy Temple in Jerusalem.

The words "take for Me" was a way of unifying the Jewish people by each and every one having a share in their first public institution. This week's sedrah and the future ones in Shemot tell us about the overwhelming voluntary contributions, so that they were told to stop giving any more. This is a problem that United Jewish Appeal and all the other Jewish institutions would like to have.

This response has an important message for us today. The words Terumah and half-shekel describe the monetary contributions, the material goods and the wisdom, understanding and knowledge of the builders of this Tabernacle. First and foremost, the fact that every single family had to contribute every year, served as a reminder that every Jewish family must remain committed to help meet the responsibilities of the total community and have a sense of ownership in the community structure.

There is an interesting statement that suggests that all Jews had to make the yearly contributions except the deaf, the foolish or insensitive one, and the underage minor. Using homiletical licence, we can understand why many Jewish families unfortunately do not fulfil their responsibilities. They may not be physically deaf but unfortunately turn a deaf ear, and have not become sensitive enough to be part of the community and help maintain the important agencies such as Hebrew schools, social service organizations, as well as the State of Israel. They have not developed a mature understanding that giving of ourselves, be it time or money, is necessary for their own well-being and that of the community and world they live in.

Toronto is a great Jewish community. To help it remain so by strengthening our own sanctuaries and organizations, we need the ideal combination that helped Moses build the first public Jewish institution. Our leaders must have educated and sensitive hearts and be inspired to properly use their wisdom and knowledge so that, together with the rest of the community, we will fulfil our responsibilities to ourselves, our community and klal Yisrael.

Guest Voices

In pursuit of justice

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Had Israel's Chief Rabbinate Council accepted the Ne'eman Committee's recommendations, non-Orthodox Judaism would have been in disarray. To the relief of many, the haredi establishment in the Jewish state – which undoubtedly shaped the response of the Chief Rabbinate Council – chose to ignore them, thus de facto killing the entire enterprise.

Despite the legitimate outrage in many quarters at the council's refusal to face the reality of the 200,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union whose Jewish status must be dealt with, and despite the harsh language calculated further to alienate Diaspora Jewry, Israel's chief rabbis' uncompromising stance has greatly helped those whom they wish to punish.

For the representatives of Conservative and Reform Judaism on the Ne'eman Committee had made enormous sacrifices for the sake of Jewish unity. They would have to curb the discretion and authority of their own rabbis by allowing the Chief Rabbinate's batei din (rabbinic courts) alone to determine who is a Jew. But because there would be an implied recognition of the non-Orthodox movements, the chief rabbis would have nothing of it. What was acceptable, according to their own understanding of Jewish law, was rejected because of their political stance.

Had they said yes to Ne'eman, it's not at all sure that the majority of Reform Jews would have been prepared to abide by it. The result might have been a split in its own ranks. By contrast, the majority of Conservative Jews may very well have agreed to the Ne'eman formula.

This, in turn, would have led to a rupture between the Conservative and the Reform movements that hitherto had been forced to make common cause in the face of haredi intransigence. Two of the three leading religious movements in American Jewry would now be at loggerheads. Reform Jews, prepared to yield autonomy for the sake of unity, would have been at a loss.

So why did Reform endorse the Ne'eman recommendations in the first place? Because had it refused, the Israeli public would have been outraged. Jews have come to take it for granted that it's the liberals who must make the concessions. When for a short while, Reform representatives left the committee, their secular supporters persuaded them to return to the negotiating table by threatening to vote for the conversion bill before the Knesset.

Now the same supporters can see for themselves who is the real obstacle to unity. Hence the near-certainty that the conversion bill, proposed by the haredi in order to ensure their continued hegemony, will not get the necessary parliamentary majority.

The attempt to bypass the process by identifying Jews by a Yod before their names on Israeli identity cards – distinguishing born Jews from converts by the dates of birth and conversion respectively – is, of course, painfully distasteful to a generation that still remembers the Jude on the yellow badge. Hopefully, the Israeli public will have nothing of it.

Therefore, in pursuit of justice, Conservative and Reform Jews have no choice but to return to Israel's secular courts. It was against the anticipated verdict in favor of the non-Orthodox that prompted the conversion bill in the first place. No doubt, the haredi camp will respond with what others will regard as harassment, inside and outside the Knesset. Nothing will have changed.

If the Haredim had so little to lose and so much to gain, why didn't they endorse the Ne'eman proposals? One of their spokespersons was reported to have said that this is evidence that the chief rabbis chose principles (claiming exclusive rights on determining Jewish status) over expediency (pleasing the Jewish public).

A different answer may be that the haredi camp has decided to give up on the overwhelming majority of Diaspora Jewry – which is solidly behind the Reform-Conservative efforts in Israel – in the hope of thus retaining control over Israel's Jews, at least as long as no Israeli prime minister can govern without Orthodox support.

The damage this will lead to is considerable. Had the Haredim made the minimal concessions the Ne'eman recommendations implied, they would have not only helped to preserve Jewish unity but also exercised a wholesome influence on those Reform Jews who are, at times, as alarmed by the excesses in their own movement as they are sickened by the intransigence of the haredi world.

Jung remains an enigma

Carl Gustav Jung (1875-1961) is one of the influential figures of the modern age. His concepts of the "introvert," the "extrovert" and the "inferiority complex" have become household words. He taught that the mind, like the body, has a very long ancestry so that an individual's unconscious mind contains his own personal experiences as well as the common inherited cultural experiences of all human beings. This "collective unconscious" manifests itself in patterns of shared ideas or archetypes.

His quest for the basic root of human behavior led him to explore yoga, Zen Buddhism, alchemy, astrology, fairy-tales, esoteric folk lore – and a score of other strange fields of belief and superstition.

After a six-year association with Sigmund Freud, Jung split from his original mentor. Essentially, the rupture was the result of their divergent views about the nature of human motivation. For Freud, the basic force which impels behavior stems from sexual energy or "libido." In his thinking, creative work or activity is no more than a "sublimation" of the libido, and God is a projection of the father image.

Jung took a much broader view. Yes, sexuality is always present, but other factors are equally important: hunger, the drive for power and the need for religion.

In the book under review, Richard Noll, a clinical psychologist and a lecturer in the history of science at Harvard University, has written a trenchant, revisionist biography that describes Jung as the founder of a pagan religion. This new form of worship consisted of a blend of German romanticism, Hellenistic paganism and religious gnosticism – the whole mishmash delivered up with a dollop of anti-Semitism.

For Jung, according to the author, Christianity (actually a form of Judaism) had failed. What was necessary was a return to an idyllic pre-Christian past, an idealization of the "primitive man" and the virtues of the Aryan Volk culture.

Noll is unsparing in his distaste for both Jung and his ideas: the advocacy of polygamy as a spiritual path, his unsavory relations with female disciples, his early flirtation with Nazism and the fantastic nature of his self-induced trances and their interpretation.

Jung was quick to deny anti-Semitism. "It must be clear to anyone who has read any of my books that I never have been a Nazi sympathizer and I never have been anti-Semitic, and no amount of misquotation, mistranslation, or rearrangement of what I have written can alter the record of my true point of view. Nearly every one of these passages has been tampered with, either by malice or by ignorance. Furthermore, my friendly relations with a large group of Jewish colleagues and patients over a period of many years in itself disproves the charge."

The author, however, writes, "Whether one regards Jung as an anti-Semite, a Nazi, a Nazi sympathizer, or any combination thereof, the roots of the attitudes expressed during the Nazi era can be found in his Volkish utopianism and Aryanist mysticism, which predate the rise of Adolf Hitler and National Socialism in Germany." Indeed, there was a time at the turn of the century, "when the idea of an Aryan Christ appeared viable – indeed, preferable – to many. And it was only natural that they should look for his closest representative on Earth."

Noll has been attacked by angry Jung supporters as unfair, biased and hostile, engaging in gossip and rumor and spreading wild and unsupported conspiracy theories.

The book does suffer from a rather desultory, scattershot approach, but the material appears well researched and the notes are copious.

Jung remains an enigma. He combined brilliant psychological insights with bizarre notions and questionable beliefs.

Purim Internet sites for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The month of Adar starts this week and that means that Purim is almost here. There is no holiday more geared towards kids (and the kid in all of us). So this week, a look at Purim Internet sites for children.

Start your tour at Kid's Korner at the Virtual Jerusalem site [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/purim/]. This large site has everything for children: from a history of the holiday and its traditions to several quizzes and games. My favorite page at Virtual Jerusalem also has a great title: The Abridged Abbreviated Annotated Scratch & Sniff Megilla, A Cuckoo Condensation [http: //www. virtual. co.il./ city_ services/holidays/purim/cookoo.htm].

This is a wonderful holiday story book complete with hilarious sound effects. Just follow the story and every time you pass your computer's cursor over a picture of a gragger, it will make the appropriate sound effect. Hear the booing when Haman is promoted to the king's second in command, listen as the gallows are built to hang Mordechai and cheer along when the Jews are saved.

The Cyber Purim Play is really two treats in one [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/purim/purim_play/]. It's a 16-page holiday coloring book that you can print out. But it's accompanied by an audio play that tells the story of the holiday. Great for kids who can't yet read. (You will need the free Shockwave plug in to hear the site; you'll find a link to it right on the same page.) Be prepared to stay a while. This is a large site that takes a while to download.

Over at Torah Tots – Purim Fun and Games, there's a lot going on [http://www. torah tots. com/ holidays/ purim/ pur fun. htm]. You can solve the secret message at Purim Letter Link, look for hidden words at Purim Word Find and find out about Purim Around the World. And there are even two versions of the Purim Megillah Story, one in English and one in Yiddish. Need help on your costume? At Purim on the Net [http://www. holidays. net/purim/costumes.html], print out masks of King Achashverosh, Queen Esther and Haman, ready for coloring.

I'm not sure quite sure about its historical accuracy but over at Purim: A Festival of Gladness [http://ezra.mts.jhu.edu/~rabbiars/purim/], you'll find out how to make an origami Haman's hat.

A couple of Web sites are geared toward teachers such as Virtual Jerusalem's Educator's Guide [http://www.virtual. co.il./city_services/holidays/purim/edumain.htm] and The Joint Authority for Jewish Zionist Education [http://www.jajz-ed.org. il/festivls/purim/index.html]. Kids will be particularly interested in the links to Purim Fun and Activities for Younger Children. (Just don't tell them it's educational.)

And finally, if you want to have the most expensive gragger on the block, go to gragger link at the Joi Purim Edutainment Site and click away [http:// www. joi. org/ edu tain/purim/]. You will hear a fine noise but your computer may be a bit heavy to shlep to shul for Megillah reading.

If you want a gragger that's a bit more portable, try your hand at building the one at Purim on the Net [http://www. holidays. net/ purim/gragger.html]. Follow the instructions and Purim night, take your home-made gragger to Megillah reading and give it a spin.

Toronto translator has warm memories of training in Smithville and life on Kfar Blum

On Jan. 22, The CJN published a letter from Miriam Beckerman along with a photograph of the letter-writer taken as a young woman in pre-state Israel. Beckerman's letter was in response to a previous Guest Voice by Erica Simmons (Jan. 8), which had chronicled the pioneer training that many young Zionists had received in Smithville, Ont., in preparation for imminent aliyah to Palestine.

The CJN was so intrigued with the letter and its writer, we sent Ben Rose to interview Beckerman.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Miriam Beckerman's roots are deep in Israel and she likes it that way.

In 1946, as a member of the Hechalutz movement, the Torontonian went to Kfar Blum, a kibbutz in the Upper Galilee, after training at the Smithville Hachsharah farm.

She married an Israeli she met at a kibbutz and their first son, Nonny, was born in Tel Aviv in the first year of the new Israeli state.

Beckerman now has two sons, Nonny and Dan, both of whom live in Toronto, and a daughter, Rena Kufri, who has lived in Rishon Letzion for 25 years. Beckerman has visited her daughter in Israel 10 times. She has four grandchildren in Israel and two in Toronto.

Her husband, Moshe, who died in 1993, was a pioneer fighter for Israel. He so impressed the British Army with his devotion that they returned to him a Palestine medal he had earned and lost as a prisoner of war in Italy and Germany fighting for the British 8th Army.

Miriam Beckerman (Dashkin) as she appeared on her Palestine identity card and as she appears today

The Beckermans moved to Toronto in 1952, where Moshe worked as a stevedore on the waterfront, before eventually establishing Beckerman Distributors Ltd.

A talented Yiddish translator, and a member of Beth Tikvah Synagogue and the Friends of Yiddish program committee, Beckerman is a volunteer at Baycrest Centre, leading a discussion group in Yiddish at their day-care centre.

She is also currently working on translating into English a Yiddish diary kept by Rivka Lozanski-Bogomolnaja in Auschwitz and various labor camps. Lozanski-Bogomolnaja, who is Lithuanian, was described by the Jerusalem Report as a one-woman vengeance squad in documenting Nazi war crimes.

Rivka Lozanski-Bogomolnaja

Beckerman hopes it will be published soon.

She is anxious to find someone who is willing to bring the 80-year-old Lithuanian to Canada to tell her story.

Beckerman's work has been recognized by the Dora Teitelboim Foundation of Coral Gables, Fla., which this year awarded her a share of a $500 prize for translating a story, The Return of Noah Amshel, by David Katz.

In addition, Canadian Yiddish writer Yehuda Elberg of Montreal has asked Beckerman to translate one of his stories.

Daughter of Ethel and David Dashkin, Beckerman attended the Farband Folkshule in the 1930s. Money was so scarce at the time that she took 25 cents a week to the Folkshule to pay for her lessons.

She earned the money to pay for her Hachsharah training by working as a bilingual secretary (Yiddish and English) at the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress, at that time located on Beverley Street.

Mounted in her apartment in a place of honor is her York University graduation diploma in English literature with honors, which she earned as a mature student.

Volunteers at Baycrest Centre

Beckerman was retained as the translator by a Jewish Milwaukee businessman married to a Toronto woman, who met Lozanski-Bogomolnaja and obtained a copy of the diary.

With the help of a British academic, David Katz, who founded the Yiddish Institute at Oxford University and who has also read the diary,

Sending the message that all familes are welcome

New stepfamily network to hold first meeting

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish Stepfamily Network, an initiative of the Temple Sinai family matters committee, will be holding its inaugural meeting March 2, 7:30 p.m. at Temple Sinai.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin, spiritual leader of Temple Sinai, said that the committee was formed two years ago because "too many people had the feeling that single people or those from divorced or blended families did not feel welcome at temple.

"We wanted to send the message that all families are welcome and that we do have active single members," said Rabbi Dolgin.

Since the committee was formed, he said, "things have changed. Committee members have become advocates for sensitivity in language and programming and have tried to sensitize our teachers."

A representative from the committee also sits on the temple board of directors. "We are making a statement that we have to take into consideration the needs of everyone, no matter what their family situation is. We are beginning with Temple Sinai, but we hope we will meet the needs of the larger community. We will attempt to bring people together and pool all our resources," he said.

John Negru, a founding member of the Jewish Stepfamily Network, who with his wife has a blended family of four children ages 10 to 14, said that members of the network came together after attending a course facilitated by Jewish Family & Child Service.

"Fifty percent of adults are involved with step families, whether their own, their children's or their siblings. Step families are more a part of society than people realize.

Seniors encouraged to participate

"The initial six sessions were so positive that we asked the agency to run another six sessions. We realized that there is no organization in Toronto that specifically addresses the joys and challenges of step families. As Jews we have special issues such as celebrating Holy Days and organizing bnei mitzvah so we decided to run the group under a Jewish umbrella. Our ultimate goal, however, is not to be gender or ethno-specific.

"Our vision of step families includes all phases of the couple's journey from dating through marriage and raising a new family. Seniors and grandparents who find themselves or their grown children in new relationships are also encouraged to participate. It is a very embryonic organization. We are providing an opportunity for people to build something from their own hearts," said Negru.

On the planning board is a resource centre about step families; phone support; help dealing with life cycle events such as brit milah, weddings, shivahs, birthday parties and graduations; and researching new developments in family law, mediation, counselling, estate planning and insurance.

The March 2 meeting will feature talks by Joe Rich, a social worker, and Deena Mandell, a psychologist, who each specializes in serving families facing separation, divorce and remarriage.

Reena, JF&CS begin new support program for disabled and families

TORONTO — Reena and Jewish Family and Child Service have joined together to launch a Community Development Project that will help support people with developmental disabilities and their families within the Jewish community.

The project has two primary objectives. The first is to strengthen self-reliance and self-advocacy skills within families. The second goal is to develop greater support and inclusion in the Jewish community for these families.

"Raising a family that includes someone with a developmental disability is very demanding and often exhausting," said Micki Bregman, project chair. "It also demands the support and commitment of the Jewish community to make sure that these families are assisted in helping each other and included in all aspects of communal Jewish life."

Families who have children with developmental disabilities are invited to participate in the project. On March 2, at 7:30 p.m., at the Reena Battle Centre, families will identify specific tasks to help move this process forward. Dozens of ideas, from creating a mentoring program to challenging agencies to draft binding inclusion policies, are being considered.

"We are eager to hear a variety of perspectives, and we are certainly interested in new and creative ideas," said Ruth Slater who is staffing the project.

The project, which was started about a year ago in an effort to encourage service providers, volunteers, communities and service users to work in partnership to help each other more effectively, was made possible through a grant from the UJA Federation Endowment.

Yehuda Elberg's "twins"

By BILL GLADSTONE

Authors

"At the age of 85, I gave birth to twins," Montreal author Yehuda Elberg recently told an audience at the Harbourfront International Festival of Authors in Toronto.

Elberg was referring to his two novels Ship Of The Hunted and The Empire of Kalman the Cripple, which were originally published in Yiddish in 1974 and 1983, respectively. After working with a translator to render them into English, Elberg asked Syracuse University Press to consider one or the other for publication. The publisher chose to produce both simultaneously this year, and both have already gone into second printing.

Elberg's work is also destined to become accessible to mainstream English-speaking audiences via another important medium. Film rights to the intensely dramatic Ship Of The Hunted were recently sold to David Brown, who produced the film Driving Miss Daisy.

Born into a rabbinical family in Zgierz, Poland, in 1912, Elberg was active in the Polish resistance during World War II. He lived in Paris immediately after the war, moved to New York in 1947, and settled in Montreal in 1956. Having survived the Warsaw ghetto while hundreds of his relatives didn't, he says he feels a sacred duty to write about the Holocaust and about the vibrant shtetl life that the Germans destroyed.

"I feel like I'm a messenger," he said in an interview. "I feel like I was saved, one survivor out of a large family, in order that I should be a witness. I feel the obligation of testifying."

Ship Of The Hunted is a gripping and masterful novel that captures one family's horrendous experiences as its various members try to survive the Nazi scourge in the Warsaw ghetto and the Polish countryside; its final, redemptive scenes show survivors on a boat bound for Palestine. Elie Wiesel said the book "is fashioned from the cloth of truth" and that "the Warsaw ghetto has finally found its novelist."

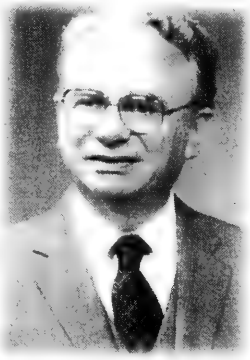
The Empire of Kalman The Cripple hearkens back to the pre-war period and records the colorful characters – saints, dunces, Jews, non-Jews, rabbis and petty politicians – that populated a Polish shtetl. At first presented as a scheming, ill-tempered rogue, Kalman changes during the story and ultimately redeems himself.

Elberg was a contemporary and distant cousin of the late Nobel laureate, Isaac Bashevis Singer, whom he knew well. He agrees that he and Singer present contrasting views of the shtetl in their fiction.

"Bashevis Singer was a pessimist. He looked at the shtetl with the smirk of irony, and you can't blame him for it because he looked at life the same way. This was his personality. It came out in his books that all Jewish homes are dirty and all Jews have crooked noses. He didn't paint them beautiful."

Elberg's fiction, however, seems to retain the wholesome homespun values of the shtetl, no matter how far his characters are forced by circumstance to stray from these humanistic ideals in their personal lives.

"I was born in the shtetl, I grew up in the shtetl, I became a writer in the shtetl, and I admire the Jewish life in the shtetl," Elberg said. "I may exaggerate a little bit because I see the high values of the shtetl. I know what the shtetl gave me and I would like to transfer these values to my children and grandchildren."



Yehuda Elberg

Yiddish, the language of the shtetl, was Elberg's mother tongue (he also speaks Polish and Hebrew) and he refers to it as "not just a language, but a culture." Despite the many dire prognostications, he responds optimistically when asked about the future of Yiddish.

"Life always finds a way. Maybe Yiddish won't be a language that mothers speak to their children. It won't come with the mother's milk. But the Jews always had a language of culture. Hebrew was the language of culture at the time of the Second Temple, but the spoken language was Aramaic. The prophets spoke Aramaic and the Talmud was written in Aramaic.

"Hebrew is now the official language of Israel, and I hope that Yiddish will be the language of culture. I don't accept what people say that Yiddish is dead or dying. Something that is dead doesn't still grow. There are still new words being created and new books being written in Yiddish. It's a living literature."

Elberg still continues to write as well as translate some of the hundreds of short novels and stories that he wrote years ago for literary magazines. Two collections of his short novels are now ready for publication in translation. Elberg credits the late renowned Yiddish writer Chaim Grade, who was a close friend, for showing him the importance of perseverance as a writer.

"We lived [after the war] on the same floor of a building in Paris, and one day he came in and said, 'Why aren't you writing?' in a fatherly tone. And I said, 'It just doesn't go.' He said there was no such thing, that it was just an excuse to be lazy. He said, 'Sometimes I have to throw out the first nine pages and start again.' So I tried the same method and found that it worked."

Grade offered strong praise for Elberg's fiction. "Elberg's principal strength," he once wrote, "lies in telling naturalistically, with strong, earthy language, of the life he knows so well, village and town, Jew and peasant, field and forest. When Elberg describes the common folk, his words are as genuine and alive as the blood that courses through the veins of his characters."

Elberg is quick to explain why Grade was less kind to Isaac Bashevis Singer, saying it was "a tragedy for the Jewish people" that Singer won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1978. "He didn't mean it that way," Elberg said, adding that many of his contemporaries resented Singer's uniquely perverse, albeit highly colorful, vision of the shtetl.

"They say it was only jealousy that made other writers criticize Singer after he won, but that isn't so. I love the writing of Bashevis Singer, and I think I learned from him. But I give a lecture entitled Jewish History vs. Bashevis Singer. I confront his description of a shtetl, of Jewish life, with quotations from the history books of the same time. And the history books often say just the opposite of what Bashevis Singer has written."

Elberg has also collected numerous prestigious awards for his Yiddish writings. A frequent visitor to Israel, he has won that country's Prime Minister's Award for excellence in literature, a prize given out only once previously to a non-Israeli, Isaac Bashevis Singer.

As well, he has won the Itzhak Manger Prize, which is often called the Nobel Prize of Yiddish literature. Golda Meir presented it to him in her last public appearance. Perhaps with the appearance of these two novels in English, Elberg may get more of the recognition from the English-speaking literary world that he so richly deserves.

A strong Zionist, Elberg does not see anything new in the religious and political battles that currently seem to be the source of considerable friction in Israel and throughout the Diaspora. "There always was division in the Jewish world and there always will be," he said, bringing an octogenarian's telescopic perspective to bear.

"Jews like to think independently and they like to think that they alone possess the truth. But the division doesn't go too deep. The war in Israel between the ultra-Orthodox and the secular – I'm certain that they'll find a way of compromise."

He also brings his characteristic hopefulness to the subject of the Arab-Israeli peace process. "Because of the horrible experiences of our generation, the Jews don't take into consideration the pain of the other side," he said. "We have a kind of blind spot to the struggles of the other side. Everyone has it to a certain measure.

"But I look at the peace process with hope that something good will come of it."

"יש מקום, חב"ד נקרא,
לישראלים הוא בית תפילה,
לכאן אבוא מידי שבעה
בעברית לשאת תפילה".

Winnipeg author claims Shin Bet murdered Rabin

'This is not a fantastic conspiracy theory'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yigal Amir, now serving a life sentence for assassinating Yitzhak Rabin in 1995, did not murder Israel's prime minister, an Israeli journalist claims.

"I don't know who killed Rabin," said Barry Chamish in an interview. "I know who didn't."

Chamish, here to deliver a lecture at the Zionist Centre, under the auspices of the Toronto Zionist Council, has written a soon-to-be-published book on Rabin's assassination called Who Murdered Yitzhak Rabin?

Chamish, co-publisher of the Inside Israel newsletter and author of Traitors and Carpetbaggers in the Promised Land, said that the conclusions of the Shamgar Commission that investigated the assassination are at odds with some of the facts.

The commission concluded that Rabin was shot twice in the back from a range of 50 to 70 centimetres.

But Baruch Gladstein, head of the Israel Police Fibres and Materials Laboratory, reached the conclusion that Rabin had been shot once from less than 20 cm and once point blank.

Amir, Chamish said, never shot Rabin point blank. And based on the testimony of witnesses, Amir was never close enough to Rabin to have fired those bullets.

"Considering the evidence, Rabin was not killed by Amir," Chamish claims in Traitors and Carpetbaggers in the Promised Land, which was published last year.

"Amir couldn't physically have fired the shots," he told The Canadian Jewish News.

"This is not a fantastic conspiracy theory," said Chamish, 46, a native of Winnipeg who made aliyah 25 years ago and who lives in Beth Shemesh with his wife and two children.

"This is a crime with contradictory evidence. Who cares if Amir confessed? Any psychopath can confess."

According to Chamish, the case is riddled with further discrepancies and unexplained occurrences.

- Six witnesses, including the surgeon who attended to the mortally wounded Rabin at Tel Aviv's Ichilov Hospital, swore that the prime minister had been shot in the chest and spinal cord, and not in the back.
- Ephraim Sneh, the then health minister, declared that three, rather than two, bullets had penetrated Rabin's body.
- The bullet that wounded Rabin's bodyguard was not of the same composition as the bullets that tore through Rabin, Gladstein reported.
- The gunshots had an odd, distinctive sound, whereas tests of Amir's pistol showed that its sound was perfectly normal, eyewitnesses said.
- A policeman who had been near Rabin on the night he was felled told the newspaper Ma'ariv that he heard five shots, three clear and two muffled.
- Rabin's driver did not use his radio to inform the hospital of what had happened, and it took him over eight minutes to reach the hospital, a distance of only about 700 metres. As a result, the hospital staff were unprepared to treat Rabin.

Chamish believes that, on an operational level, the non-Arab anti-subversive unit of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security agency, was behind the assassination.

"Someone ordered this unit to kill Rabin" he claimed. "This unit was setting up [right-wing] Jewish radicals for arrest to delegitimize opponents of the Oslo peace process."

In this connection, Chamish contends that Avishai Raviv – a Shin Bet informer – was involved in an official plot to stage Rabin's assassination, and that the scheme fell apart when live bullets were used instead of blanks in Amir's gun.

He claims that the Shin Bet has "organized riots and demonstrations" to keep him quiet.

Chamish, who opposes the current peace process as a suicidal threat to Israel's existence, claims that the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations (CFR) is "manipulating" every facet of Israel's negotiations with the Palestinians.

He claims that the CFR, whose alleged agenda is a one-world government, groomed Rabin, as well as Benjamin Netanyahu, for leadership.

"All our leaders, left and right, have been corrupted by the CFR." Chamish also asserted that "the Israeli government is run on blackmail and bribery."

Torah in Spanish latest offering at Aish Hatorah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's Spanish-speaking Jews have a new program aimed specifically at them, thanks to Israeli sociologist Paulo Rosenbaum.

The program, Torah in Spanish, operates out of the Aish Hatorah building in Thornhill.

"Aish Hatorah is wonderful – they gave us a computer, a desk, e-mail, and the staff to help us out, even though we are not a part of Aish Hatorah. They even let us translate their Shabbat Shalom fax into Spanish and send it out."

Contrary to what many most people think, the majority of Spanish-speakers in Toronto are not Sephardim. "They are Ashkenazi Jews who just happened to wind up in Spanish-speaking countries, just like Canadian Ashkenazim wound up in an English-speaking one," Rosenbaum explained.

Participants include people from all levels of observance and knowledge, but from many different countries, including Bolivia, Panama, Peru, Spanish Morocco, Columbia, Venezuela, Brazil, Mexico, and Bulgaria.

Paulo Rosenbaum

One, he said, even speaks Ladino, an ancient Spanish dialect, that now is only spoken by pure Sephardim from Turkey, Bulgaria and Greece.

"They come from 25 countries," Rosenbaum said. "Until now, no one could unite them."

Programs include a Wednesday night class on the weekly Torah portion, and a Monday night class on Jewish mysticism.

While the Wednesday program is at Aish Hatorah, the Monday one is at Dover Shalom synagogue, on Regina near Baycrest, the home of Rabbi Avraham Bartfeld, who takes an active part in the program, and serves as its spiritual leader when necessary.

Special events have included a Chanukah party, called Chanukah caliente, and a Tu b'Shvat party, that Rosenbaum whimsically called Tutti Frutti Tu b'Shvat. He is planning a Discovery program in Spanish, to be held on March 22 –"the first one in Spanish held in North America" – a Web page, to include a d'var Torah from various segments of the Orthodox community; and information services, to let people know about what is happening in the city.

Rosenbaum even hopes to expand Torah in Spanish to other cities in North America, especially Miami, Los Angeles and New York, which all have sizable populations of Spanish-speaking Jews.

"I want to show the sweetness of Torah, through Chumash, Rashi, Aggadah and Midrash," Rosenbaum said.

Student celebrates the day she 'started to live again'

For the final instalment of The CJN's four-part series on eating disorders, we look at recovery through the stories of two women and their lives after eating disorders.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Alana Hirschberg celebrates two birthdays every year. July 2 marks her chronological age and March 15 is the anniversary of the day she "started to live again" by entering an intensive in-patient eating disorder treatment program at the Douglas Hospital.

Last year, Alana faced her biggest challenge since her recovery four years ago. Severe osteoporosis, an unpleasant legacy of her years as an anorexic (compounded in her case by steroids used to treat asthma), caused a spontaneous vertebral fracture.

Not only did she spend three months in a body cast and eight months using a walker, but her medication triggered a 60-pound water-weight gain, she said in a telephone interview.

"If I could deal with everything emotionally then, I can pretty much make it through anything," said Alana. "When bad times come up, the fear is that I will use my eating disorder as my crutch."

Alana, now 22, is back on track. A nursing student at Concordia University, she plans to work with eating disorder patients as a psychiatric nurse. She exercises to strengthen her bones, eats to keep her body and weight healthy, has a supportive boyfriend and speaks publicly about her eating disorder in an effort to save others from the same ordeal she endured.

It began innocently, like many eating disorders do. In Grade 11, Alana decided she wanted to lose five or 10 pounds after gaining weight on Prednisone, a steroid prescribed for her severe migraines. Alana's mother Linda took her to a dietician to come up with a healthy eating plan.

An initial loss of about seven lbs. in one week was due in part to discontinuing her medication. When the weight loss slowed, Alana began to exercise compulsively and cut back on her food.

Her parents – Jack, a psychologist, and Linda, a physiotherapist now studying Institutional Administration at Concordia University – soon realized what the problem was. "You can't stop the progression even when you know – and trust me, we tried," said Linda.

These days Linda, through her work as an intern at Jewish Family Services (JFS), is trying to prevent eating disorders through education and to provide support to those affected. She also serves on the board of the Quebec branch of the Anorexia Nervosa and Bulimia Association (ANAB).

It was her belief in the need for Jewish support groups that led her to JFS. "If I could help one person live through what I had to live through, then going through it was worth it."

Alana had begun her diet at a time when she was emotionally vulnerable. The granddaughter of two Holocaust survivors, she had recently returned from the March of the Living. Her beloved grandfather (not a survivor) had died two weeks before she left.

Alana Hirschberg

In March of the following year, Alana went into cardiac arrest and was rushed to the Montreal Children's Hospital, where she stayed for five months. Only weeks earlier, she had convinced herself she was a hypochondriac, not an anorexic, despite meeting all the criteria on a brochure she received at school.

"I was not a very compliant patient," she recalls. "I'd stuff food down my shirt, exercise in the hallway. Those things you see in the movies – they do happen."

The day she turned 18, she signed herself out against medical advice.

She continued to see a psychologist, but eventually the 5'4" teen reached a perilously low 65 lbs., half of what she'd weighed before she became ill.

Even when the effects of her 300-calorie-a day diet were becoming more apparent, Alana wasn't ready to help herself. A former straight-A student, she couldn't concentrate on anything. Her hair began to thin and her skin bruised "from the inside, because my bones were knocking against my skin." She suffered from hypothermia (subnormal body temperature), and fine hairs began to grow on her body and face as nature's way of keeping her warm.

About halfway through her second year at Vanier CEGEP, Alana stopped attending school, because she'd pass out on the way there. She took to sleeping in a main-floor den, because she was too weak to walk upstairs to her bedroom.

The turning point came when her little cousin was visiting and asked to see a three-foot Elmo doll. Alana passed out reaching for it and tumbled down the stairs.

"I realized then that everything I was trying to be thin for – I'd be dead before [it happened]. You think you'll be prettier, happier. I realized one of my biggest dreams was to do well in school and eventually work in the medical field."

She was finally ready to get help. Within the week she called the Douglas Hospital, a psychiatric facility with an intensive eating disorder treatment program.

Luckily, one of the program's six beds became available that month. Treatment involved individual and group therapy, cooking lessons, visits to restaurants and exercise therapy "to teach us how to exercise without being compulsive. I learned a great deal. I had no idea what a normal portion size was."

Alana came to realize "that an eating disorder really has nothing to do with eating or wanting to be thin. It has to do with yourself. I had no self-esteem. I didn't think I had friends or that I did anything well."

Her mother described the young Alana as outgoing, very popular and good in school. "She never saw herself as beautiful. She didn't see what everybody else saw in her."

A lot of people with eating disorders are perfectionists, said Alana. "I was always coming up a little bit short. That's a horrible feeling. You lose your sense of self...the mind of the eating disorder takes over."

Alana has two "voices" in her head, she explained – the voice of the eating disorder and "my voice, what I call the 'Alana voice.' The anorexic voice tells you you're stupid. If you don't have a sense of self, the Alana voice is very quiet because you don't believe in Alana.

"As I got better, the Alana voice got stronger until it was able to overpower the anorexic voice. I still hear it but the other one is the strong voice now. I don't have to get 100 percent in order to be worthy. I'm worthy within myself."

Her recovery was the hardest battle she'd ever faced. "It's not like you have a lot to fight with because you don't have a sense of self. The only thing that kept me going was I knew the worst thing would be living the rest of my life as an anorexic."

For the first couple of years after her recovery, Linda served as Alana's sounding board as Alana worked at maintaining her health. At first, said Alana, "my mother didn't realize I had control over my feelings, that I would sound them off, not act upon them. The differ-

Larissa: Story of recovery

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A decade ago, Larissa's hands were testament to an ongoing struggle with bulimia. Her chewed-up knuckles had scraped her teeth with alarming frequency as she forced herself to vomit after food binges, and her nails took on a purple tinge when her weight dipped too low.

Today, Larissa, a 35-year-old mother who asked that her real name not be used, has been healthy for six years. Her hands have healed, and her manner is confident and unpretentious.

Sitting in her cheerfully furnished living room surrounded by family photos, toys and artwork, she thumbs through a family album, her wedding band sparkling in the light. She's come a long way from the stick-thin young woman in the photos.

Larissa was never overweight. A trim 5'4", she no longer weighs herself every day, stepping on a scale only for her annual check-up.

Within six months of beginning a diet at age 17 – and restricting her food intake further to prove to her worried parents she could do what she wanted – she was admitted to hospital weighing 85 pounds. It was only the beginning of her battle.

Although she seemed to recover from her anorexia, she became bulimic before she was out of her teens. The first time she purged was a deliberate attempt to control her weight, "and then it just escalated," she recalls.

Binging and purging became "like an addiction." She would plan her day around a binge, stopping to buy specific foods. Even medication didn't help control her compulsion.

Her illness "really did a number" on her teeth, she says ruefully. At one check-up, she had nine cavities.

After making the rounds from one doctor to another for 12 years, Larissa finally stopped her self-destructive behavior when she became pregnant with her first child.

It was just the motivation she needed. "I was so worried about anything happening [to the baby]. It sort of shocked me into straightening up." She went back to her psychologist, but "didn't feel the need" to continue with counselling after a few visits.

"It's not like it magically disappeared," she reflects, "but I guess I had other priorities. I didn't feel the need to binge." Her family doctor, who was aware of her medical history, monitored her closely throughout her pregnancy.

Although the loss of one's shape in pregnancy goes against an eating disorder patient's need to assert control, Larissa didn't find it "that scary" to lose control of her body shape. She regained her figure quickly, although she still found it "an adjustment." Now she works out "for health" and to set a good example for her children.

A recent back injury kept her from her usual routine of running several times a week, but "it hasn't especially bothered me that I haven't been able to do it. I know my limits right now."

A milestone in her recovery came about six weeks after the birth of her first child when she popped a button on a pair of jeans that she'd struggled to put on. "It didn't really bother me that much."

She admits to still thinking a lot about food, but her reasons are different. As a stay-at-home mother, "that's my role. I'm the feeder.

"I cook pretty healthy – meatloaf, squash, broccoli, that kind of stuff. I don't measure every calorie, but if I know I'm going out for a huge dinner, I'll tend to eat lighter during the day."

Although she still has a sweet tooth, her meals consist of wholesome foods, in moderation. "No one in my family is that big an eater."

Even so, "everything centres around food. Being Jewish, our life centres around what we're going to make for the holidays. [On a family trip to Florida,] it's, 'So where are we going for dinner?'"

Larissa realizes she used to strive toward an unrealistic image, shaped partly by the media. Now she looks for clothes that flatter the body she has.

"I've got hips no matter what I do. I may not be happy about my shape, but it's my shape. I don't care. To a certain extent, I want to look nice. My husband [who knew of the bulimia from the beginning and has been a constant source of support] thinks I look fine. I know I can get dressed up and look absolutely terrific if I want."

She would urge anyone with an eating disorder to take a first step toward getting better. "I think professional help if you do have a problem is really important. I think you have to have some motivation. There is light at the end of the tunnel."

TORONTO — Dr. Miriam Kaufman, a pediatrician at the Hospital for Sick Children, believes eating disorders can be cured, but says doctors don't have a good way to predict which ones will be.

Bulimics, who tend to seek help sooner, have a lower mortality rate. "They know you shouldn't really make yourself throw up," says Kaufman. "But anorexics think everything's fine and that they just have to lose more weight."

The "classical view," says Kaufman, is that 30 percent of anorexics get better, and 30 percent get "better enough so they can maintain a reasonable weight."

Some eating disorders go on for decades. Ten to 20 percent of cases prove fatal, according to statistics from the National Eating Disorder Information Centre (NEDIC).

When searching for a therapist or treatment program, a "consumer approach" (comparison shopping) is recommended, said Margaret Beck, NEDIC's acting program coordinator. "Patients are most helped when they feel comfortable with the treatment and when they feel they can trust the treatment provider."

The centre does not endorse any treatment that uses an addiction model of eating disorders. One such program is Overeaters Anonymous (OA), a 12-step program praised extravagantly by two longtime members in separate interviews with The CJN. One man, who attends meetings at a local synagogue, called OA "nothing short of a miracle."

The program has some merit in that it brings people out of isolation, conceded Beck. Whether or not eating disorders follow an addictive pattern is "quite a controversy," she noted.

Linda's fear subsided over time. "Now I know when she's upset, she'll call and talk, and I know it's talk. It took me time."

Motivation comes relatively easily when physical symptoms are at their worst, but it's harder once patients begin to put on weight. "You think, 'Maybe I am getting fat,'" said Alana. "You have to reconnect with yourself."

Over the five months she spent at the Douglas, Alana was "slowly reintegrated into society." After discharge, she returned for therapy twice a week, then once a week, then every two weeks, then monthly. "The day they closed my file at the Douglas was a very nice feeling."

Following her recovery, Alana and her longtime boyfriend broke up. "I was a different person. I had my own thoughts and I wasn't afraid to say them. We weren't as compatible after."

Sometimes people tell her she could have gone to medical school instead of pursuing a nursing career. "Would I be as happy?" she wonders. She chooses to push herself a little less hard and enjoy life a little more, she said.

She is grateful for having had the chance to spend five months "doing nothing but learning to like myself" and has been back to the Douglas to visit other eating disorder patients and encourage them. She also makes herself available as an ANAB speaker and has been to schools to discuss her experience.

"I get such a positive response from talking to the kids. It's a bad thing that happened to me. No matter what I can do, I can't change that. If I can help one person feel better about themselves, it makes the whole experience a little less negative. I'm very lucky. I cherish my life. I'm one of the few who did manage to recover. I feel like I should pay something back."

Festival to feature work of Jewish student artists

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A first-ever Jewish student Arts Festival, featuring a multi-media art exhibition highlighting the work of over 40 university and college students, will be held March 1 and 2 at the North York Public Library Central Branch.

The festival, co-sponsored by Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto and the action committee for Jewish continuity of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, will kick off March 1 at 8 p.m. with performances of different types of Jewish music.

Among the performers will be Limore Twena, a business student at York University who also sings in the band Epiphany; York student David Rosen, who studies voice under Cantor Benjamin Maissner; and the klezmer group Kallarash.

The art on display includes photography, paintings and sculptures by art students and hobbyists. There is also an audio documentary by Ryerson Polytechnic University student Jeff Lieberman on actor Theresa Tova. The works were limited to two themes: discovering one's Jewish identity and Israel's 50th anniversary.

A pre-show look at some of the pieces revealed high-calibre work involving some bold uses of color, thoughtful takes on the themes and intricate representations thereof.

"They really span the gamut, which is what will make the festival interesting," said festival coordinator Sidura Ludwig, a York student and co-editor of Dorot: A Contemporary Jewish Literary Magazine. "I'm really excited for it, because it gives attention to a section of the community that often isn't given attention – young adults and also Jewish artists."

A panel of judges – York fine arts student Ellie Richmond; Dorothy Shoichet, president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts; Judy Singer, who teaches painting, drawing and art history at York; and Michael Amar, visual arts teacher at Central Technical School – will grant monetary awards for the most outstanding submissions.

"A lot of Jewish students are involved in arts and cultural expression. Many of them are expressing themselves Jewishly, but they're not necessarily connected to the organized, formal Jewish community," said JCS director Zac Kaye. "We hoped this would be a way to reach out to them and connect up with them, and seemingly it has. It justified everything we thought would happen."

Admission to the show, which is expected to become an annual event, is free.

ADL teams with Myerson to fight racism

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) and a former Miss America who experienced bigotry during her reign announced that entries are being reviewed in a national writing competition for college and university newspapers on interfaith and multicultural issues.

The Bess Myerson Campus Journalism Awards recognize excellence in campus reporting, and promote commentary that reflects a sensitivity to cultural differences in the campus community. Bess Myerson confronted anti-Semitism first hand as she travelled across America during her reign as Miss America.

Concerned about today's rising racial and religious tensions on college and university campuses, Myerson developed this new program for campus journalists.

"Student journalists have a tremendous opportunity to foster an environment of tolerance and understanding on their campuses through their newspapers," said Myerson. "Through these awards it is my hope to encourage open dialogue between all student populations."

"The Bess Myerson Campus Journalism Awards," said Abraham Foxman, ADL national director, "encourage college students to think critically about racial, religious and ethnic tolerance and to promote communication between diverse groups. Through her establishment of this award, Bess has continued to commit herself to helping young people overcome racism and prejudice."

Administered by ADL's department of campus affairs/higher education, the awards competition was open to all recognized campus newspapers at colleges and universities throughout the United States. Articles submitted must have been previously published in a campus newspaper and written by enrolled undergraduate or graduate students. The winners will be announced in the spring following review by the ADL campus affairs/higher education committee.

'One cannot simply compare ethnic data'

Quebec sociologist doubts reported population drop

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — McGill University sociology professor Jim Torczyner, who co-authored a series of demographic studies of Canadian Jewry based on the 1991 census, is skeptical about the results of a mid-decade census conducted by Statistics Canada. The census suggests the number of persons in Quebec who identify themselves as Jewish by at least part of their ethnic or cultural origin has declined.

The census, taken in June 1996, found a total of 92,390 respondents who claimed to have Jewish ethnicity. That includes 60,495 who cited "Jewish" as their single ethnic identification and 31,895 who listed "Jewish" as one of two or more ethnic origins.

In 1991, a total of 98,055 persons in Quebec identified themselves as having Jewish ethnicity, including 77,600 who gave "Jewish" as their only ethnic origin. In 1986, 98,195 persons identified as Jewish ethnically, including 81,195 who gave "Jewish" as a single response to the ethnic question.

Torczner's skeptism stems from the fact that the questionnaire allowed respondents to identify themselves Jewishly only by ethnicity and not by religion as well. "It's only in the ball park when you don't ask about religion."

He believes one cannot simply compare the ethnic data in 1991 and 1996 and conclude that there are almost 6,000 fewer Jews in Quebec. Nor can it be simply said that Jewish identification by religion is a more reliable measure, he said. Both sets of data are needed to come up with an accurate total, he said.

"This is not a linear thing; it's much more complicated. You have to see how the two variables interact."

Nationally, 351,705 persons identified themselves as at least part ethnically Jewish in 1996, including 195,810 who cited "Jewish" as their only ethnic origin. Ontario is, by far, the home of the largest number of ethnic Jews: 191,445, of whom 108,430 see Jewish as their only ethnic origin.

The 1996 census did not contain a question on religious identification. The full-length questionnaire, distributed to one in five households, contained the question: To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did this person's ancestors belong to? "Jewish" was one of the identifications listed among possible answers.

The number of persons identifying as Jews by religion in 1991 in Quebec was 97,735.

Torczyner arrived at a total Montreal Jewish population of 101,210 in 1991 using the following definition: "A Jew is someone who identifies himself/herself as being 'Jewish by religion,' or 'Jewish by religion and Jewish by ethnic origin,' or 'Jewish by ethnic origin with no religion.'"

In that way, only those persons who identified themselves as Jewish ethnically but with a religion other than Jewish were excluded.

"In other words, if you have 100 people who say they are Jewish by ethnicity and 110 who say they are Jewish by religion, it doesn't mean there are 110 Jews. There's probably 130 Jews," Torczyner said.

Also, in an aged community, like Montreal, ethnic Jewish identification tends to be lower because older Jews tend to confuse ethnicity with country of origin.

Using ethnic origin alone as a means of determining Jewish population, especially when multiple responses are possible, can also have an inflating effect. For example, Statistics Canada's 1991 ethnic origin report records 375 persons as Jewish by a single or multiple response in Quebec City; 240 in Sherbrooke; 70 in Trois-Rivieres; and 20 in Chicoutimi-Jonquiere.

KlezKanada back for third year

MONTREAL — KlezKanada, a celebration of klezmer music and Eastern European Jewish culture in the Laurentians, returns this summer for a third year.

Registration will not begin until May, said chair Hy Goldman, but inquiries are already coming in from Europe, South America, Australia, the United States and across Canada.

"I'm not really sure how we're going to manage. Registration will have to be kept down to 325-350, including those staying on and off-site," he said. With the faculty and some 40 young scholarship winners, the number of people at this year's KlezKanada, Aug. 19 to 23, at Camp B'nai Brith, will be about 425. That's just about the maximum if the event is to continue to be manageable, if not intimate.

Unlike last year, KlezKanada will not be competing with Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival, which took place at approximately the same time last year.

KlezKanada is aimed equally at serious instrumentalists, singers and performance artists who wish to upgrade their skill at workshops with the masters of klezmer and Yiddish theatre, and at those who simply love the sound and ambience of Yiddish culture. The event has attracted people of all ages, Yiddish-speaking, but mostly not.

Over the four days, there will be planned and impromptu concerts, workshops, discussions, film-screenings and the popular late-night KlezKabarets, where everyone is welcome to sing along.

Headliners at KlezKanada this year include the returning Brave Old World, an American klezmer band which has recorded with violinist Itzhak Perlman, and the "up and coming" Chicago Klezmer Ensemble. Goldman notes that the two bands complement each other in that the former is breaking new ground in what may be classified as klezmer, while the latter specializes in a traditional 19th century sound.

Sure to be popular is the Heritage Klezmer Ensemble, made up of golden-era klezmer musicians who had their hey-day in the 1940s and '50s. It is hoped the famed Epstein brothers, subject of the film A Tickle in the Heart, will be among them.

Other big names include Bruce Adler, an actor of the Yiddish theatre and Broadway; singer Adrienne Cooper; old-time Yiddish stage star Seymour Rechzeit; filmmaker Josh Waletsky (Image Before My Eyes, Partisans of Vilna); and, signalling a broadening of the event's cultural focus, Ladino and Judeo-Spanish singer Lilliana Acaly from Italy.

Most of the entertainers will perform in the public concert Aug. 22.

The industrial Polish city of Lodz will be highlighted this year. Scholar Robert Shapiro of Baltimore and Montreal Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb, a native of the city, will discuss its Jewish history.

Eleanor and Joseph Mlotek of New York who preserve Yiddish songs will also return. They recently published Songs of Generations: New Pearls of Yiddish Songs, their third anthology and based on a column in The Forward, which they have written since 1970.

She is the musical archivist at the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research; he is managing editor of the Yiddish edition of The Forward.

There are a number of scholarships awarded to persons under 25 who show an aptitude for klezmer music or the Yiddish language or literature.

Among the sponsors this year are the Zukerman Charitable Foundation of Toronto, the Tauben Foundation and the Lenor and Alfred Segall Foundation.

Rabbi Hirschprung known as fount of Torah knowledge

By RABBI HARRY KAUFMAN

MONTREAL — For the past 50 years, Montreal Jewry was privileged to benefit from the leadership and spiritual guidance of Chief Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung, an exemplary Torah scholar and intellectual giant, who personified in many ways the supreme principle that Torah is life and the essence of being.

Shloshim

Born in Duklo, Poland, in 1913, in his formative years he was a brilliant student of the Lubliner Yeshivah in Lublin, Poland, under the tutelage of his great and renowned mentor Rabbi Meir Shapiro, of Daf Yomi fame.

His diligence and studiousness were unflagging and with his photographic memory, he became a fount of learning, an unfailing source of Torah knowledge. He was also able to find answers to questions brought to his attention by searching out the most obscure areas of the Talmud and its commentaries and utilizing these references to resolve and define contemporary issues and problems.

Being in his presence and listening to him talking with others, one could not go away without learning something new and instructive. One could become mesmerized by his anecdotal ability to recall his great teachers of the past generations and to make them live once again before our eyes.

Most of all, he was able to project an added dimension, so that learning was not only an intellectual pursuit, but a joyful experience. It was a rare synthesis of mind and heart, which Torah metaphor characterizes as simchat haTorah, the joys of the Torah, when the mind, the repository of our intellect, is overcome by emotion and passion.

His brilliant Torah interpretations were enhanced by the sense of joy and celebration that accompanied every new insight that he presented. It appeared that he was not only addressing his listeners but was dancing before them with the Torah. What made his love of Torah so unique was that it soon became obvious that he not only loved and rejoiced in Torah, but that his love of Torah brought him to love and rejoice in people.

The commonly accepted cliché is that an uncommon scholar is so thoroughly absorbed in the esoteric that he has little or no interest in anything or anyone else. However, those whom Rabbi Hirschprung met were immediately captivated by his warmth, humility, openness and disarming personality.

Young and old, observant and non-observant, scholar and layman, found easy access to him. His perennial question on meeting anyone was always, "Vos lernt ihr?" ("What are you learning?") This was not a challenge or a probe but a signal of what mattered most to him – learning.

His public life as chief rabbi, which began in the '60s, was exemplified and blessed by an ability to reach out and be warmly accepted by all groups and factions in the community. All could and did identify with him, whether chassidic or non-chassidic, Orthodox or non-Orthodox, old or young, newly arrived or third generation Canadians.

A Torah Jew who was able to bring us together, to help us work together on behalf of Yiddishkeit, to build a caring Jewish community, to build our schools of learning, he was involved in founding one of North America's outstanding schools, the Beth Jacob School of Montreal.

He helped in the building of new hospitals and rehabilitation centres and led the Vaad Ha'ir and rabbinate of Montreal to new heights of communal unity and accomplishment.

His public interest and endeavors were not confined to Montreal as seen in his historic visit to the former Soviet Union in the late '60s. Rabbi Hirschprung, among others, was responsible for the first shipments of religious articles and matzot for Passover sent to the former Soviet Union in the late '60s, for the first time since the revolution.

Rabbi Hirschprung was instrumental in publishing the monumental Torah writings of his illustrious grandfather, the Rav of Duklo, and the manuscripts of other Torah giants.

He was an avid supporter, and wrote for, the Kenader Adler, the only Yiddish daily newspaper in North America outside New York City, which appeared in Montreal for more than 70 years. As difficult a task as it was to maintain this Yiddish newspaper as a daily or as a weekly, he was in the forefront in helping this paper survive, as he helped many struggling Yiddish authors to publish their works.

No area of Jewish life was beyond his concern and total involvement. His heritage, his life's work and his example are indeed the great need of our time.

HAMILTON ROUNDUP

Negev Dinner to honor survivors

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — This year's Hamilton Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner will include tributes to the State of Israel on its 50th birthday and to survivors of the Holocaust, say JNF co-presidents, Hilda Rosen and Claire Waxman.

The highlight of the evening will be entertainment by the original Kuni Lemel, stage and film performer Mike Burstyn, Waxman said at a recent Negev Dinner kickoff. Speeches, she said, will be kept to a minimum.

The theme for the evening is From Dreams to Reality. "We want this to be a celebration of life. Not so long ago, Israel was a dream but it is now reality. For survivors too, dreams became reality. They made it. They built new lives for themselves. We want it to be a happy evening," she said.

Proceeds from the dinner will go towards the JNF's Action Plan Negev project, and in particular, the planting of olive groves on Kibbutz Mashabei Sadeh.

Hamilton-based regional JNF emissary, Brig.-Gen. Dubi Dekel said at the kickoff that the idea of the project is to develop the Negev for the future – to roll back the desert.

The greatest need is for water said Dekel, and the plan is to build up the water supply so that recreational forests, orchards and olive groves can be planted. "We want to change the color of the desert," he said.

Israel's success in the greening of the desert, Dekel said, has brought people from places such as China and Arab countries.

Shmuel Brog, the Montreal-based JNF education director whose mandate is "to spread the news about Israel," spoke about the importance of educating the young, especially those in smaller communities, who do not have ready access to information.

He says that the difficulty lies, for instance, in explaining to children used to rivers like the St. Lawrence, that Israel's most important river, the Jordan, "is only as wide as this room." Or that unlike Canada with its one million lakes, "Israel has only two lakes, and one of them is dead."

Among those present were last year's Negev Dinner honoree, Mayor Bob Morrow, and Hamilton West MPP, Lillian Ross.

The dinner on May 27, at Adas Israel Synagogue, will be chaired by former CHML radio host and Negev Dinner honoree, Paul Hanover.

Orthodox woman Greenbaum named to head the federation

Greenbaum, a hematologist who works two days a week at St. Joseph's Hospital, says that one of her goals as president is to increase participation in the UJA campaign and raise more money.

"I'm pleased that the forever-talked-about Community Endowment Fund is finally getting under way," she says.

Her priority, however, is to work on education, especially for teens, and she would like to see Midrasha, the supplementary Jewish high school program, turn into a community Jewish high school.

"We have a lot of great programs for our kids," says Greenbaum, wife of Dr. Joseph Greenbaum and mother of six sons.

"We are now able to give scholarships for the Israel Experience. The JCC has new leadership programs, and the McMaster Jewish Students Association and the student Chabad House are so important. We have everything except a Jewish high school. If we don't give our kids a high school education, we'll lose them."

Her sons attended Hamilton Hebrew Academy, which although Orthodox, has students from all congregations. When the oldest four graduated they continued their studies at yeshivot.

"We have a very well integrated Jewish community. Others are always amazed at how well our shuls work with community organizations. I don't see that anywhere else. We have to keep on building these relationships."

Among her activities, Greenbaum has been involved with Adas Israel sisterhood, Emunah Women, Hadassah-WIZO and United Jewish Appeal. She is immediate past campaign co-chair of State of Israel Bonds. —M.W.

Information kits to aid Swiss bank claimants

HAMILTON — A handy information kit is now available to survivors or their descendants who believe they may have a claim on a dormant Swiss bank account but don't know how to go about filing a claim.

The kit was prepared by the Robert Burns Society of Hamilton who obtained its information from the Internet and from the Swiss Bankers Association.

It has been brought to the attention of the Jewish community here by Robert Burns Society member, Andy Robertson, who said that copies of the kit have been distributed to Hamilton area public libraries. News releases have also been sent to local newspapers, radio and TV stations.

The Robert Burns Society of Hamilton assembled and printed the information as a goodwill gesture, he said.

"There are absolutely no commercial aspects to this project at all. Our society, is an old established, volunteer, non-profit group, seeking to add to the quality of life in our community," said Robertson.

The kit contains six lists of names: three lists of owners of dormant accounts; and three of those who were given power of attorney by account holders.

The deadline for filing claims is March 31, 1998, and the Robert Burns Society is anxious to distribute the information kit as widely as possible. Organizations and individuals interested in obtaining the kit should contact Ena McCulloch, president, Robert Burns Society of Hamilton, phone 905-525-6647, or Robertson, phone 905-389-4509 or via e-uail at [andyr@tartan.on.ca].

Edenbridge once had a vibrant Jewish presence

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

In the heart of the Saskatchewan prairies, where a merciless wind whips the fields, a lone synagogue stands, its only companions the dead who are buried in the nearby Jewish cemetery.

The Beth Israel Synagogue is the last evidence of a small group of Jews who arrived in 1906 with nothing but memories and dreams, built a thriving community in the middle of nowhere, and then left it for bright city lights a few decades later.

Step inside the sanctuary and you are immediately mesmerized by its aura of holiness, despite the isolation: the elegant dark wood interior, the dusty pews warming in the late afternoon sunshine and the bimah lovingly cloaked in velvet. If you listen carefully, you can almost hear the whispered prayer of the congregation and feel its long-gone presence. This is an emptiness like no other; it transports you, momentarily, elsewhere.

"People would get lost on their own land, when they first arrived," said 84-year-old Charlie Vickar, who was born in Edenbridge and lived there for 77 years before moving to a nearby town. "I remember winter-time funerals where we waded through waist-high snow to get to the cemetery, digging graves in temperatures of -50 C."

But his memories are predominantly good ones: of the rich sense of community shared by the families who lived there, of dances at the Edenbridge hall and of his bar mitzvah in the synagogue in 1926, celebrated with cake and whisky.

"I don't know how such poor Jews ever came to build such a beautiful synagogue," he mused.

In 1905, a group of Lithuanian Jews sat around a table in Cape Town, South Africa, their home of five years. They had left their native lands to escape rampant anti-Semitism, inspired by dreams of owning and working a land where they could practise their religion untormented. Contrary to expectations, however, they found themselves working in retail in Wynberg, a suburb of the Cape.

And then they stumbled across a pamphlet that changed their lives forever. Issued by the Canadian Department of Immigration, it promised prospective immigrants 160 acres of land for $10.

These intrepid few had long harbored the desire to farm land of their own, and well recalled how they were denied this opportunity by the governments of eastern Europe. The offer of land ownership in a country of equal opportunity was one they could not refuse. They formed an "on-to-the-land" movement, gathered fellow enthusiasts and soon embarked on a journey that took them into the heart of northern Saskatchewan.

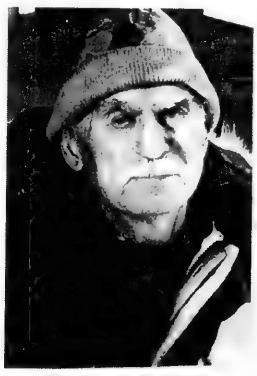
In the years that followed, this peripatetic people built their homes alongside the banks of the Carrot River, 20 miles from the nearest village, Star City, an area rich in forests and water.

In 1907, a bridge was constructed over the river's rushing waters, providing employment for most of the new settlers, who welcomed the opportunity to earn direly needed cash. With the opening of the post office a year later, the new settlement needed a name. Canadian officials were intent on avoiding names designating ethnicity or religious affiliation, and refused to permit "Jewish Bridge" or "Israel Villa," the pioneers' first choices. Eventually they allowed the name "Edenbridge" to represent the colony, unaware that it was a subtle version of "Yiddenbridge," a bridge of Jews.



Charlie Vickar

A shared Jewish heritage and an ardent desire to work the land united the group, and before long other Jewish immigrants from Poland, Lithuania, Britain and South Africa arrived to share the dream of freedom. In spite of – or perhaps because of – their national and linguistic differences, Edenbridge brought this diverse cluster of pioneers together, uniting them in times of struggle and joy. And times were tough, especially for Jews more accustomed to religious study than to manual labor.

Despite the odds, the Jews persevered in the face of extreme adversity: a flu epidemic in 1918 that killed many, droughts, spring floods and the many surprises of

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our fourth annual Purim Art Contest and we are looking for drawings about Purim from students in elementary school.

Who can enter: Children from grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 12. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small or too large. Please paint, draw, or color bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. And you can even give them a title. Please send us your name, address, phone number, school and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 27, 1998. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen for publication as "winners." The judges will base their decision on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 6, 1998.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 12, 1998. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

The Edenbridge Beth Israel Synagogue

'A bridge of Jews'

Saskatchewan's unrelenting climate. The dense bush, forests and mosquito-infested swamps that covered the terrain upon their arrival had to be cleared before the settlers could acquire title to the land, a back-breaking process replete with trial and tribulation. From their toils there emerged a vibrant, healthy and successful community, one that reached 56 families at its zenith in 1920, their flourishing farms producing wheat, oats, barley and flax.

The majority of the Edenbridge settlers were Orthodox Jews who brought with them the rich cultural and religious life they were accustomed to in eastern Europe. Within 2½ years of their arrival, they built a synagogue that was to serve the congregation for 60 years, imported a rabbi to the colony, created a library with Yiddish and English literature and established a commercial industry with kosher butcheries and stores.

The monument at the synagogue

Jewish cultural activities developed, too: drama and debating societies, Yiddish and Hebrew studies, and a youth movement called the Young Judeans Club. Children attended cheder lessons on a daily basis after regular school hours, with the Rev. M. Shallitt, also the shochet of Edenbridge.

Ultimately the attractions of urban life and its promises of broader horizons and greater opportunities lured the younger generations away from the brave prairie settlement, while farm mechanization made it more difficult for small farmers to compete with their larger rivals. By the late 1930s, people started leaving Edenbridge, an exodus that continued to empty this once vibrant settlement until 1968, when the synagogue was officially closed.

It was rescued from imminent demolition by Norman Vickar, a one-time resident of Edenbridge who, as a member of the provincial legislative assembly, campaigned for its preservation. The 40-acre site housing the synagogue and cemetery is now maintained by the Saskatchewan Wildlife Federation, its faded visitors' books reflecting the many travellers who have strayed this way and stopped briefly.

A few stragglers continued to farm at Edenbridge until the '80s, when poor health forced them to retire to the nearby towns, selling or renting their land to larger farms adjacent to their own. Charlie Vickar is one such retiree, who now lives in Melfont's suburbia, an adjustment to which he cannot succumb.

"I miss the freedom, fresh air and independent life of the farm, the open space and the change of seasons," he said.

Vickar and his brother were the last to leave Edenbridge; today the home their parents built at the beginning of the century stands empty, slowly deteriorating. It's one of several deserted and crumbling residences that remain on the nine-mile gravel road once populated by courageous Jewish pioneers and dubbed the "Jew Line" by gentile neighbors.

The descendants of Edenbridge are scattered all over North America today, but the Beth Israel Synagogue continues to preserve the final echoes of the community's industrious past.

"Life at Edenbridge taught us to persevere and to believe in ourselves," Vickar said. "Most of all, it taught us to never forget we were born Jewish."

Jewish 'virtual community' joins forces as Zionet

TORONTO — Three of Canada's five Internet-based Jewish virtual communities have joined forces through amalgamation recently, producing one large, vibrant group, organizers hope.

TorJews (a Forum for Toronto Jewry), CanJSO (Canadian Jewish Students Organizations) and Zionet (a List to Network Canadian Jews) members discussed and approved the merger at the end of last year, and amalgamation took place officially on Jan. 2. The new group has nearly 500 members operating under the name Zionet.

"The main method of participating in the Canadian Jewish virtual community is through simple e-mail, using list servers," said Adam Aptowitzer, moderator of the CanJSO group. "Through e-mail, people sign-up to participate in a daily discussion on topics of interest to Canadian Jewry. Membership is free, and you don't need access to the World Wide Web, just e-mail," added Aptowitzer, a graduating student at the University of Calgary.

According to Avi Hyman, moderator of TorJews, "the main problem in having too many different groups was the fractionalization of the community, particularly in membership, leadership and costs."

TorJews was set up about five years ago by Yehuda Poch as a forum for information on the Toronto Jewish community. Until recently, computing services for the group were provided free of charge by the Virtual Jerusalem company in Israel. In recent months however, Virtual Jerusalem embarked on a strategy to charge for community forums and since TorJews was a volunteer operation, the group decided it should look for free services closer to home.

"In addition to financial issues, TorJews had suffered from a number of acrimonious debates, and a small number of members attempted, but failed to start a rival group," added Hyman.

"From my perspective, the Zionet model was attractive because it was run locally in Canada, it had an active membership, and it had a complimentary Web site run by the Montreal Hillel House," said Hyman, an instructional technology specialist at the University of Toronto.

Zionet, the oldest of the three models was started by Sander Wasser, manager of Direct Support Services and Education at McGill University's Computing Centre, and fellow Montrealer Sam Totah. Zionet is run through the services of McGill.

In the first note to the amalgamated group Wasser wrote "Welcome to all new members of Zionet. As of today the members of TorJews and CanJSO have joined Zionet to form a single list of Canadian Jewry. We hope that with these participants we will keep the list informative and active – keeping Canadian Jewry networked."

Group forms single list of Canadian Jewry

Although Aptowitzer's CanJSO group was the youngest of the three, it did have the broadest cross-Canada representation of any of the groups; its membership consisted heavily of student leaders from the various university-based student groups across the country.

"In CanJSO's case, the problem wasn't vibrancy, but leadership," said Aptowitzer, now studying in Israel, but still part of the group. "I was finishing my program, and we needed someone committed to running the group properly. Zionet had a good model and it was closer to home than Shamash, the Jewish Internet consortium at Boston Hebrew College that we were using," he added.

While the membership of the group includes dozens of Canadians living in Israel and the United States, there are others, either Canadians or people just interested in the Canadian Jewish scene, living in Russia, Poland, Austria, Australia, Italy, France, Argentina, Portugal, and even one member each from the Philippines and Singapore.

Canada's other two Internet-based Jewish virtual communities are 'CaJINet' – the Canadian Jewish Information Network, and a group run by the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (formerly the Canadian Jewish Historical Society). The topic of joining the amalgamation had been discussed concurrently on 'CaJINet', but its membership has yet to resolve the issue.

The new group's e-mail address (to participate in discussions is: [ZIONET@VM1.McGill.CA]. For those familiar with Listserv procedures, the subscription address is: [Listserv@VM1.McGill.CA]. The Hillel-based Web site is: [www.hillel.montreal.qc.ca/zionet .html].

Fatah warns of riots if U.S. attacks Iraq

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH and MOHAMMED NAJIB

JERUSALEM — As pro-Iraqi rallies continued in the West Bank last week despite a Palestinian Authority (PA) ban, Fatah officials warned that if the United States takes military action against Iraq, the demonstrations will become more violent, but they will stop if a peaceful solution to the crisis is found.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, meanwhile, told the Fox TV network last weekend that he does not anticipate taking any preemptive action against Hamas, which has threatened to carry out terrorist attacks against Israel if the United States launches air strikes on Iraq.

"We expect the Palestinian Authority to jail these terrorists," he said. "Unfortunately, in the last month, they've released about 60 Hamas terrorists, and that's going the wrong way.

"What we'd like to see is real movement to peace, which means fighting terror and educating the Palestinian public opinion and youngsters that you don't support Saddam, you support peace."

Marwan Barghouti, a PA Legislative Council member and Fatah secretary general on the West Bank, said the movement has the right to organize demonstrations, which he claims reflect Palestinian frustration at the breakdown of the peace process.

Last Saturday night Palestinian police arrested eight Palestinian journalists, including Hamdi Farraj, the owner of the Shepherd Television station in Bethlehem, which was ordered shut down by the PA last week. Farraj said he was released Sunday morning after being questioned for six hours.

PA Chairman Yasser Arafat told reporters he was hopeful that UN secretary general Kofi Annan would succeed in reaching a diplomatic solution to the Iraqi crisis.

At Bir Zeit University, a crowd of 500 students demonstrated in support of Iraq, calling on Saddam Hussein to bombard Tel Aviv with chemical weapons. The students, who burned U.S. and Israeli flags, began stoning IDF troops and border police and passing Israeli vehicles.

Palestinian police present during the rally were unable to prevent the students from approaching IDF soldiers. In the ensuing clashes, two 19-year-old students were wounded by rubber bullets used by Israeli security forces to disperse the rioters. Both were reported to be in stable condition at Ramallah Hospital.

IDF troops arrested four Palestinian rioters. Palestinian sources claimed that IDF troops used live ammunition and tear gas to quell the rioters.

At An-Najah University in Nablus, hundreds of students took part in a rally led by some 16 masked Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine activists carrying a mock Scud missile, pictures of Che Guevara, fake machine guns and suicide bomber belts. The students burned U.S., Israeli and British flags.

Two Czech synagogues rise from ashes of the past

By RANDI DRUZIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — It is a tale of two synagogues.

One is being restored to its former glory; the other is being rebuilt on the ashes of one of central Europe's largest synagogues.

Closed for decades since World War II, the Great Synagogue of Pilsen was rededicated earlier this month after undergoing some $1.7 million in renovations.

"It was incredible," said Arnost Bergmann, leader of Pilsen's Jewish community. "It was like a dream come true. I couldn't believe it."

The synagogue, which has two 150-foot towers, can seat more than 200 people — almost double the number of the city's small Jewish community.

Participating in the Feb. 11 ceremonies were the chief rabbi of the Czech Republic, Karol Sidon, and Israel's ambassador to Prague, Raphael Gvir, who carried a Torah to the synagogue from the head office of the Pilsen Jewish community.

The speakers included the mayor of Pilsen, Zdenek Prosek, who commemorated the 3,000 local Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

The synagogue, which was built at the end of the 19th century, was saved from destruction during World War II because the Nazis used it as a storehouse for looted Jewish property.

About 15 years ago, the local Jewish community began raising funds for its renovation.

"We approached companies and Jewish communities all over the world," said Bergmann. "But we couldn't raise more than $3,000."

Then in 1991, the Czech government designated the synagogue a historical site and earmarked $1.7 million for its renovation. The Pilsen municipal government also contributed to the effort.

An additional $2.9 million is needed to refurbish the frescoes, organs and rabbi's quarters.

Bergmann said the synagogue — which he described as one of the world's largest — will not only be used for worship, but also for concerts and cultural events, which he hopes will cover operational expenses.

In the northern Czech town of Liberec, the local synagogue needed far more than a renovation.

When Nazi troops stormed through Liberec in November 1938, demolishing Jewish shops and homes, they intended to crush Jewish life in the northern Bohemian town forever.

The local synagogue, which was built in 1889, was destroyed.

"There was nothing but ruins," said Samuel Gutman, head of Liberec's Jewish community. "The Germans did a thorough job."

But now construction crews are busy erecting a building that will house a synagogue and research library whose collection will reflect its location in the former Sudetenland, which lies at the crossroads of three cultures — Czech, German and Polish.

Hitler annexed the Sudetenland in 1938 after signing the Munich pact with British Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, whose widely criticized policy of appeasement was intended to prevent the recurrence of a world war.

"We got the land back through restitution and were deciding what to do with it," said Gutman. "We wanted to pay tribute to those who perished in the Holocaust and decided this undertaking was worthwhile."

The project was launched in October 1995 under the patronage of Czech President Vaclav Havel and his German counterpart, Roman Herzog.

They had hoped it would promote good relations between the two countries, both of which have pledged to cover the construction costs.

The new synagogue's sanctuary will seat 120 people — more than ample space for the 84 members of the town's Jewish congregation.

The building will also house a lecture hall and the administrative offices of Liberec's Jewish community, which consists of 30 families.

Gutman said that the synagogue, which is slated to open in the spring of 1999, is the first to be built in the region in 60 years.

The new building will also house an extensive library that will include more than 200,000 volumes of nonfiction in Czech and other languages.

The library's director, Hana Opatra, said the collection would be unique.

"It has a lot of material from the second half of the 19th century and from the first four decades of this one," she said. "Much of the material deals with issues connected to the Sudeten region."

Authorities anticipate visitors not only from the Czech Republic, but also from Poland and Germany.

Certainly, some of the material in the library will touch on what curators refer to as the "sometimes tense and awkward relations" among the three nations bordering the Sudeten region.

It is an uncomfortable subject for some — but one that is being given some attention.

IDF, SLA stop Hezbollah from attack on Lebanon post

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — IDF and South Lebanese Army (SLA) troops recently repulsed an apparent attempt by Hezbollah to over-run the SLA's Soujud outpost in the northeast of the security zone.

Reports said several squads of Hezbollah gunmen were involved in the attack launched under cover of heavy mortar fire.

The attackers advanced to within a few hundred metres of the position and opened fire with light machine guns and automatic rifles.

Security sources said IDF and SLA troops fired back using machine guns, rifles, mortars and artillery, forcing the attackers to retreat. There were no IDF or SLA casualties.

The Hezbollah mortar fire continued after the failed attack, apparently to help extricate the infantry squads.

Some gunmen may have been hit in the fighting which lasted more than an hour.

Hezbollah gunmen also fired mortars at an IDF outpost in the east of the security zone, causing no casualties or damage. IDF gunners returned fire.

Mortar rounds damaged a house in Rehan village in the security zone.

The attacks followed four days of relative quiet in the zone which coincided with the longest-ever session of the Grapes of Wrath monitoring group.

The five-nation committee began its discussions into complaints from Israel over mortar fire at Kiryat Shmonah and at Shiheen village in the west of the zone.

There were no casualties in Kiryat Shmonah. Five people were wounded in Shiheen.

The monitors recognized Israel's complaint regarding the mortars which fell in Kiryat Shmonah, damaging two homes, despite strong denials by the Lebanese delegation.

The committee determined that the incident was a clear breach of the understandings reached at the end of Operation Grapes of Wrath in April 1996.

It also recognized another of Israel's complaints regarding mortar fire from within Shakrah village, north of the zone.

IDF's Hebron redeployment — one year later the peace negotiations as well as specific incidents that incited the Muslim residents.

An example of this incitement was the distribution last summer by Tatiana Susskin of a poster depicting Mohammed as a pig. In June and July, over 800 incidents were recorded which were thought to be a direct response to Susskin's action. Susskin subsequently received two years in prison. Earlier in the year, Land Day and the building at Har Choma led to Palestinian civil unrest.

Almost five months ago Major Igal Sharon was appointed the IDF commander in Hebron. He already had experience dealing with Palestinians in his previous post as IDF commander of the Jordan Valley.

"Hebron is the only city in Israel that has Palestinians and Israelis living together," Sharon said. "On one hand, we have the wish of most of the population to live together and lead a normal life; on the other hand, we have friction between the two sides. There is a basic hatred and mistrust between the two sides. Every small friction between Israelis and Palestinians can lead to serious clashes due to religious and national fanaticism. Palestinians say that if peace can succeed in Hebron it can succeed anywhere.

"The Hebron agreement is, in my opinion, a good accord and it has the potential to lead to successful coexistence. There is cooperation on the military side at all levels. One of the big problems for the Palestinians is to maintain control of their civilian population. It will take time before all problems can be solved. If you take the case of children born into the violence of the intifadah, it will take at least a generation before mutual confidence can be restored," said Sharon.

"The majority of the Israeli population living in the city are the same law-abiding citizens that can be found anywhere in Israel. There are a small number who are very provocative and are not contributing to the peace process and co-existence in Hebron," he added.

It has to be remembered, he said, that the Jewish population is very small. It is in the centre of a big Arab majority and the Jews feel threatened. "But there has been provocation from both sides in the past."

Sharon gave examples of some serious provocation by Jews that occurred in the past year, including the Susskin incident and the shooting of six Palestinians in January 1997 by an IDF soldier, Noam Friedman.

"However, most of the violence has been of Palestinians towards the Israeli population. The Palestinian Authority has to control their own population and keep law and order," said Sharon.

"There are Palestinian terror cells here whose only aim is to disrupt normal life. Cooperation over security is just as important to the Palestinians as it is to the Israelis. It is in the interest of both sides. We also have to remember the religious aspect. There is a potential of violence over religious rights in Hebron that could engulf the whole Middle East.

Short fuse

"There is, I might say, a short fuse here that could explode and spread to the whole West Bank. The IDF is ever watchful, but you cannot predict every move of a deranged individual like Noam Friedman or Baruch Goldstein."

David Hamelech Street (known as Shuada Street by the Arab population) is the main thoroughfare, used by both Jews and Arabs. It connects almost all the main centres of Jewish interest in downtown Hebron. It is here that the core of 50 Jewish families live, often on the receiving end of Palestinian-thrown stones. The Jews here are well protected by a large contingent of IDF soldiers who try and maintain a tranquility in the area.

Noam Arnon is the leader and spokesperson of the tight-knit Jewish community. He is in no doubt as to the right and necessity of a strong Jewish presence in one of Judaism's most holy cities.

Arnon is critical of the Oslo accord. He feels that the accord pushes peace even further away. "I am sure that the Arabs are preparing for a war — they always say it. Just listen to what Arafat says in Arabic, not English. In Arabic he speaks a different language; he speaks of holy war, destruction, returning to Haifa, Jaffa, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. When Arafat praises the terrorist 'engineer' Yehiya Ayash, and names a main street in Gaza after him you can tell he is not a man of peace."

Arnon, after describing the isolation of the small Jewish presence in Hebron, goes on to tell of the tragedy of 1929. We are standing outside Beit Hadassah almost at the end of the territory under Jewish Israeli security.

"Beit Hadassah was built as a hospital by the Jewish community in 1833; it served both Arab and Jew alike. We had lived for many, many generations in good relations with the Arabs," Arnon said. "On Aug. 24, 1929, 67 Jewish men, women and children were murdered by several thousand Arabs in anti-Jewish riots. Many bodies were dismembered and many others tortured and maimed.

"The rest of the Jews were expelled by the British. Following this, the Arabs moved into the Jewish homes. In 1929, there was no State of Israel, it was nothing to do with politics — the Jews had lived here for centuries. In 1980, six Jews were murdered on their way to Beit Hadassah for Friday night prayers — so the tension continues today. In the last year it has been most violent; we have not heard one word of peace from the Arab leaders. We only hear words of threats and violence. I would expect Mr. Natche [Hebron's Arab mayor] just to say, 'Let's try and live in peace with the Jewish community, let's open a new page.'

Noam Arnon

"In fact," said Arnon, "the mayor says all the time that he wants to see the Jews out of Hebron. I do not think that this is the atmosphere we could expect after the peace agreement. But I must tell you I am not surprised; maybe those who expected more from the peace agreements are surprised. The Hebron protocol makes very clear the right of everyone to move freely all over the city without hindrance.

"This has not happened. The Jews are not allowed to move in the Palestinian zone of the town; most of the city (98 percent) is closed for Jews. Whenever we tried to walk in the Palestinian side of the town we were threatened and told not to come again. The Palestinian police have beaten and arrested some Jews. We in the Jewish community here have only one street to move in. Even the IDF does not let us have free access to Area H-2, where they control security. I would like to know why they [the IDF] have closed this area off to Jews?"

The Jewish presence around Shuada Street remains at about 500 Jews. The Israeli government, much to the annoyance of Arnon, will not allow the community to enlarge in this area.

Arnon sees no justification for Jews to stay away from Hebron, even though after 1929, the Jews were forced out. "We must build again this cradle of Jewish history. We cannot abandon this city of our Fathers. If you read the Bible you can read all the inspiration and sources to support this belief."

French prosecutor seeks to ban Le Pen from politics

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — A state prosecutor is seeking to defang France's best-known anti-Semite.

The prosecutor has asked a French court to sentence Jean-Marie Le Pen to three months in prison and ban him from public office for two years on charges he assaulted a female politician during a legislative campaign last year.

The 69-year-old head of the xenophobic National Front was on trial last week for allegedly grabbing Socialist candidate Annette Peulvast by the collar of her blouse and shaking her violently when he was campaigning for his daughter, Caroline, two days before the final round of voting on June 1.

He is also accused of kicking two demonstrators hostile to his party and calling another "faggot."

Prosecutor Jean-Claude Dumaret also asked the court to strip Le Pen of his voting and civil rights for at least two years and fine him $3,300.

If the court agrees with the prosecutor's request, it would be the most severe blow to date for Le Pen, who has already been fined for some of his remarks, such as one indicating that the Nazi gas chambers were a "detail" of the history of World War II.

But it would not prevent him from running in regional elections next month because the sentence could not be applied until his appeals were exhausted. Le Pen has said he would appeal, which could take up to a few years.

"With such methods, dictators wouldn't need gulags or concentration camps because they could get rid of political opponents behind a facade of pseudo-legality," Le Pen said in a statement.

Jean-Marie Le Pen

He has, in turn, taken legal action against several anti-National Front demonstrators on charges they infringed upon his right to campaign.

Peulvast, who went on to beat Caroline Le Pen for the National Assembly seat, was slightly hurt in the incident. She is asking for $16,500 in damages.

Le Pen led several thousand supporters Saturday in a rally in the Paris suburb of Versailles, the site of his trial, lambasting the government with the slogan, "Communists, assassins; socialists, swindlers!"

The National Front claims some 15 percent of the nationwide vote on a platform advocating the expulsion of some four million immigrants and reserving jobs and housing for French-born nationals.

cost of the staffers' or dependents' trips home.

Seventeen Canadian diplomats are assigned to the Tel Aviv embassy, the aide said.

"I don't know how many of them will pick up the option," he added.

He said that in all likelihood the advisory would be applied to Kuwait, but he was not sure whether it applied to Jordan as well.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright authorized "the voluntary departure of U.S. government dependents and non-emergency personnel from U.S. embassies in Kuwait and Tel Aviv and the consulate-general in Jerusalem," her spokesperson, James Rubin, said.

He said this decision was "a precautionary measure in response to individual concerns."

It is not based on intelligence to the effect that there is an imminent threat against Kuwait or Israel or against Americans "in Kuwait, Israel or in areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority," he said.

A U.S. official stated that workers had inquired about contingency plans in the event the situation deteriorates and leads to U.S. bombings of Iraq. As a result, the State Department has decided to pay for those employees to fly home, the official said.

The Week in Israel

Feb. 16

• Hamas militants threatened to strike at Israel if the United States attacks Iraq. The threat to strike "deep into the Zionist entity" was in a leaflet distributed to news organizations.

Feb. 17

• Israeli and Palestinian officials would neither confirm nor deny a report that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met at his home with two top Palestinian negotiators in an effort to move the peace process forward.

Feb. 18

• The Reform movement, in Israel petitioned the High Court of Justice to compel the religious council in Netanya to allow a Reform woman, Joyce Brenner, to sit on the council.

Feb. 19

• A number of rabbis circled Israel's borders by airplane on a mission aimed at warding off an Iraqi missile attack. They blew shofar and recited prayers for the protection of the Jewish state.

• A U.S. airlift of chemical weapons detection equipment arrived in Israel as the government made arrangements for tourists to pick up gas masks at their hotels or at Hamashbir department stores.

Feb. 20

• The United States promised to send Israel additional Patriot missiles and launchers if the mission to Iraq by UN secretary general Kofi Annan fails.

50 Years Ago

LAKE SUCCESS, Feb. 16 (JTA) — The UN Palestine Commission today made public its report on the Palestine security situation. The report warns the Security Council that only the prompt establishment of a "non-Palestinian" armed force can prevent serious trouble in Palestine and effectively implement the partition decision of the General Assembly.

Only such a force can replace the British troops that are now the sole barrier to a complete deterioration of the situation to "open warfare," the Commission continues. Any alternative would be "catastrophic," it emphasizes, and would involve "bloodshed and human suffering."

U.S. goals were unclear

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, left Baghdad on Feb. 23, certain he had averted a war and hammered out an acceptable agreement giving UN inspectors completely unfettered access to all of Iraq's weapons sites and production facilities. He was scheduled to present a report to the Security Council later this week.

Mideast Analysis

The United States, which only last week seemed poised to attack Iraq, adopted a cautious wait-and-see attitude. Cognizant of Iraq's spotty record, Washington deferred judgment on Annan's 11th-hour diplomatic mission so that it could study the fine print of the accord.

The Clinton administration wants to be sure that the deal conforms with UN resolutions and its own national interests, and that arms inspectors will be be free to seek out and destroy Iraq's remaining stockpile of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons of mass destruction.

Washington articulated these demands with uncommon clarity. But in all other respects, American goals during this crisis were not clearly defined, and there were unanswered questions. That is one of the reasons why some Americans opposed President Bill Clinton's threat to bomb Iraq into compliance.

Clinton, in a major speech on Feb. 17, explained that the broad purpose of an aerial bombing campaign would be to "seriously diminish" Iraq's capacity to make non-conventional weapons and threaten neighboring countries, including Israel. Last autumn, however, Clinton outlined a far more ambitious plan "to destroy" Iraq's arsenal. Yet, as war loomed closer, the United States appeared to scale back the scope of its military operation and lowered expectations of what could be accomplished by air power alone. Washington had already ruled out a ground offensive.

As well, the United States was vague as to what the targets of a bombardment would be. The White House suggested that weapons sites and factories would be hit. But Gen. Anthony Zinni, commander of U.S. forces in the region, said that Iraq's military structures would be targeted too.

Clinton claimed that his intention was not to unseat Saddam Hussein. But two weeks ago, he declared that the Iraqi people "would be better off if there was a change in leadership." Secretary of State Madeleine Albright sounded a similar theme.

Neither Clinton nor his closest associates ever spelled out when a bombing mission would be finished. On the other hand, they spoke of a sustained campaign.

Furthermore, Clinton did not explain what he would or could do if Iraq ended its relationship with Unscom, the UN special commission charged with finding and eliminating Iraq's non-conventional weapons. Annan had warned that a war could mean the end of the UN's monitoring regime of Iraq's weapons programs.

Clinton declared that air strikes would stop Iraq from menacing its neighbors. But he could not reconcile this belief with the fact that every Arab country but Kuwait and perhaps Bahrain was staunchly opposed to force. It was definitely a weak link in his strategy.

Clinton acknowledged that UN inspectors had eliminated more weapons than were destroyed during the 1991 Gulf War. Why, then, would additional air strikes have been more successful than inspections?

The targets of any American strike would have been chemical and biological installations. But hitting them would have released deadly toxic fumes over Iraq and perhaps the entire region. Finally, Clinton never indicated whether he would be receptive to alternative measures to deal with Iraq's recalcitrancy.

The alternatives to air strikes could have been the following: tightening the existing economic embargo, expanding the northern and southern no-fly zones, prohibiting Iraq from deploying tanks and troops south of the 33rd parallel, cutting off Iraq's contraband trade in oil, and building up the Iraqi opposition to Saddam Hussein.

These are options Clinton may yet consider.

RUNNING FOR PRESIDENT

On March 4, the 120 members of the Knesset will be electing the next president of Israel. Seen in this photo is Shaul Amor, 57, the candidate of the Likud party. The incumbent president, Ezer Weizman is seeking election for a second term, the maximum allowable under Israeli law. The winner officially takes office on May 1.

Conservatives consider taking their case to court

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A Conservative Jewish leader said he was "skeptical but hopeful" after hearing Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's pledge last week to continue efforts to resolve the conversion crisis in Israel.

Rabbi Joel Meyers, the executive vice-president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the Conservative movement's rabbinical arm, made his comments after hearing Netanyahu's address at the assembly's international convention in Jerusalem. In his speech, Netanyahu urged the 350 rabbis attending not to give up hope on the recent proposal offered by an interdenominational committee headed by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman.

"I think that with goodwill, this solution can be carried out," said Netanyahu. "I am not willing to give it up."

But, in a letter presented to the premier at the convention, the Rabbinical Assembly said the Ne'eman Committee's recommendations were meaningless "without the explicit cooperation of the Chief Rabbinate."

The Ne'eman Committee's proposal aimed to head off legislation that would enshrine the Orthodox monopoly over conversions in Israel in law. It recommended establishing a training institute for conversions that would involve Reform, Conservative and Orthodox rabbis, but would leave the Orthodox in control of the actual conversions.

But the proposal was dealt a blow after the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate failed to endorse it earlier this month. The rabbinate said it would establish more rabbinical courts to perform conversions, but that it would not participate in the proposed joint training institute.

In its letter, the Rabbinical Assembly said it accepted the Ne'eman Committee's formula, but only "on the condition that the Chief Rabbinate agree to work together with us in a spirit of mutual respect and tolerance."

The Conservative movement said it hoped a compromise could be reached, but that meanwhile it would continue its struggle in the Supreme Court and the public arena.

Netanyahu angered the Conservative and Reform movements by praising the Chief Rabbinate's statement when it was issued.

But, last week, he said he was pleased with certain parts of the rabbinate's decision and less pleased with other parts.

"I think Netanyahu is trying very hard now to look at the positive aspects of what occurred when the Ne'eman Committee report was released," Rabbi Meyers said.

After the Chief Rabbinate's action, it was expected that the Orthodox political parties would press for quick passage of the conversion bill.

But last week some 80 Knesset members, including Netanyahu, signed a petition supporting the Ne'eman Committee formula. Knesset member Alex Lubotzky of the Third Way Party plans to introduce a resolution next week backing the proposed conversion solution.

Some attending the Rabbinical Assembly's convention, however, were not enthused by that kind of legislative action.

Rabbi Ehud Bandel, a member of the Ne'eman Committee and leader in Israel's Conservative Masorti movement, said he was opposed to pushing the Ne'eman Committee's recommendations through the Knesset.

Such action would give the committee's findings legal status without a guarantee that the Orthodox rabbinate would sign up, he said.

WJC: no breakthrough with Vatican on Nazi gold

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The World Jewish Congress (WJC) last week denied that the Vatican has agreed to release hitherto unseen archival files pertaining to Nazi gold.

Avi Beker, director of the WJC's office here, dismissed as "deeply deceptive" media reports of a breakthrough achieved by Lord Janner of Braunstone as a result of his London meeting with Vatican Undersecretary of State Archbishop Tauran.

"In actuality, Archbishop Tauran offered to hand over to the Holocaust Educational Trust 12 volumes of documents that were published over 20 years ago," Beker said.

'Deeply deceptive'

The contents had been expected to shed new light on the location of gold and other Jewish property looted by the Nazis.

But Beker said the Actes et Documents du Saint Siège Relatifs à la Seconde Guerre Mondiale was published at the instruction of Pope Paul VI between 1967 and 1977.

"They have been freely available since that time," he went on, noting that he "uses the copies in the library at the Hebrew University on Mt. Scopus."

Janner heads the London-based Holocaust Educational Trust and is WJC vice-president. He has been spearheading a campaign to convince the Vatican that the documents relating to Nazi gold should be made public. The Holy See has been adhering to its traditional policy of barring access to its files for 100 years from the time they are deposited.

Referring to the 12 volumes released 20 years ago, Beker said they were "skillfully selected by well-briefed Jesuit historians" and "reveal nothing untoward regarding the Vatican's wartime activities."

He said that "it is a mistake to give the Vatican credit for pretending to open archives."

Janner was not available for comment, but an official at the Holocaust Educational Trust in London acknowledged that the documents in themselves did not constitute a breakthrough.

The official said that the breakthrough was in the process, rather than the substance of Janner's mission to the Vatican.

"We're not claiming that the release of the documents is unprecedented. But what we believe is important is that the Vatican has given us the documents – which are not generally available – and has invited us to go back to them if we have further questions," said the official.

Researchers find orderly 'street map' of the brain

REHOVOT, Israel — With thousands of neurons firing signals in all directions and forming trillions of possible connections, you'd expect the working brain to be a messy place.

Yet a new study conducted by researchers from Max Planck Institute of Psychiatry in Martinsried, Germany, and Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science reveals that brain cells engaged in different tasks in the visual cortex form "mosaics" that are amazingly orderly and elegant.

The study, featured on the cover of December's Journal of Neuroscience, used the optical imaging method developed by Weizmann's Prof. Amiram Grinvald, which has made it possible to provide an extremely detailed map of how the brain is organized when it processes information.

"Our maps of the working brain are so orderly they resemble the street map of Manhattan rather than, say, of a medieval European town," says Dr. Mark Huebener of Max Planck.

Beyond allowing us to marvel at the beauty of the brain's design, this research may assist in the development of artificial vision systems.

"Over the course of evolution, the mammalian brain developed its sophisticated architecture not in order to provide scientists with pretty pictures but in order to function as efficiently as possible," says Grinvald.

"Once we fully understand the principles behind this efficiency, we may be able to use them in artificial systems," he says.

The research team included Huebener and Prof. Tobias Bonhoeffer of Max Planck Institute of Psychiatry, and Dr. Doron Shoham and Grinvald of the Weizmann Institute's Neurobiology Department.

In the new research and in two preceding studies conducted by Grinvald and colleagues, optical imaging was used to examine the spatial relationship between neurons responsible for three aspects of vision – perception of depth, shape and color – and revealed that they form remarkably orderly interrelated mosaic-like patterns.

Groups of neurons responsible for depth perception are organized in parallel columns, while the "shape-savvy" neurons form patterns resembling pinwheels (first visualized by Bonhoeffer and Grinvald). The centres of the pinwheels are aligned along the centres of the columns in relatively straight lines, as are the clusters of neurons responsible for color perception. Moreover, the pinwheels' "spokes" always cross the borders of the columns at a right angle.

Obviously, these regular geometric relationships between different groups of working neurons are governed by specific rules that are far from random and apparently serve to maximize the efficiency with which the brain processes visual information.

Scientists have long suspected that, despite its overwhelming complexity, there is method to the brain's "madness": as long as 30 years ago, Nobel-winning neuroscientists Torsten Wiesel and David Hubel talked about the "architecture" of the brain at work.

"Architecture" implies that once we know how to look, we'll discover that the networks of functioning neurons form orderly structures depending on their task.

Yet until recently, brain imaging techniques did not provide sufficient resolution to reveal such structures.

It was precisely for this purpose that Grinvald – while working in Wiesel's laboratory at Rockefeller University – developed the optical imaging method used in the current study.

Optical imaging makes it possible to visualize the detailed organization of the brain at work because it can map the brain's functional architecture with an extremely high resolution, allowing scientists to observe structures as small as 0.05 millimetre in size. In contrast, the resolution of other imaging methods is too low to accomplish this kind of mapping: functional magnetic resonance imaging, or f-MRI, provides a resolution of only one to three millimetres, and positron emission tomography, approximately five millimetres.

Gila Almagor brings play to T.O.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Acclaimed Israeli actress Gila Almagor will perform her one-woman play, The Summer of Aviya, at the Leah Posluns Theatre on Thursday, March 5 at 8 p.m. for one night only

The play is based on her 1987 best-selling autobiographical novel, which was also turned into an award-winning movie.

A veteran of the stage and screen, Almagor has performed The Summer of Aviya more than 900 times in Israel and abroad, but never in Canada.

"I do it because there is a great demand for the play," she said in a telephone interview from her home in Tel Aviv. "I do it again and again. I cannot close it."

The Summer of Aviya , which she will perform in English in Toronto, is set in the early 1950s and turns on Almagor's childhood relationship with her mother, a mentally ill Holocaust survivor.

"Families – parents and children – come to see the play," she said. It's heart-warming."

Apart from having performed The Summer of Aviya at the Habimah National Theater of Israel, where she started her career at the age of 17, Almagor has taken the play to some 15 countries, including Germany, Britain, Holland and the United States.

By all accounts, it has received more performances than any other play in Israeli history. And the novel has been incorporated into the curricula of Israeli schools.

After her Toronto appearance, she will take the play to Los Angeles, San Francisco and Washington.

The movie version of The Summer of Aviya was a critical and commercial success. It won two Israeli Oscars and the Golden Bear Prize at the Berlin Film Festival. It was screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival and at a retrospective of Almagor's films at Cinemathèque Ontario. And it had a four-month run at the Carlton Cinema.

Last week, as part of a retrospective of her movies, The Summer of Aviya was shown in six Italian cities. On March 1, the film is scheduled to open at the Kennedy Centre in Washington, D.C.

Almagor is currently playing Maria Callas in a Habimah Theater production. She plans to return to Israel from her North American tour during the third week of March to begin a new movie – a psychological thriller – directed by Shemi Zarchi.

Voted best movie actress of the decade in 1990 by the Israel Film Institute and the Tel Aviv daily, Yediot Acharonot, Almagor has appeared in more than 50 films, from Siege to Under the Domim Tree.

Her films are a microcosm of Israeli society and its triumphs and tragedies since statehood in 1948.

In an interview with The Canadian Jewish News, she said that the prospect of an American attack on Iraq fills her with foreboding, anxiety and fear because of the possibility that Iraq may fire Scud missiles at Israeli cities again.

"I am very scared," she said unabashedly.

During the 1991 Gulf War, when Israel was hit by 39 Scuds, an Iraqi missile cracked a glass wall in her apartment.

"I pray to God that nothing will happen this time, and that the crisis will pass without a war."

Referring to nation-wide festivities which will mark Israel's 50th anniversary later this year, Almagor declared that peace is the greatest gift Israelis long for.

"I hope our leaders can present us with this gift. I want to live in peace for a while, just to see how it works. We've tried everything else. One thing we haven't tried yet is simple peace."

Top harpist to perform Srul Glick composition at charity fundraiser

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jennifer Swartz, principal harpist with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, will perform a specially commissioned harp sonata by composer Srul Irving Glick at a fundraiser at the University of Toronto March 19.

Swartz, 26, will present the first major performance in Canada of Harp Sonata – The King David, at An Enchanting Evening, a concert to benefit two charities, The Reena Foundation and Homes for Adults with Autism and PDD (HAADD).

The Reena Foundation provides community services for people with developmental disabilities, with emphasis on providing Judaic programming and a Jewish environment for their clients. HAADD is working to help people with autism establish a home and develop their fullest potential in pursuing an independent lifestyle in the community.

Swartz, who was in Toronto recently visiting her parents, includes in her repertoire classics, as well as romantic and contemporary music. "I like exploring new music," she says."The harp is an interesting instrument with many possibilities. That's why I am so excited about the piece by Srul Glick."

The King David was commissioned by Swartz and Judy Loman, principal harpist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), on a grant from the Canada Council.

Glick, who will introduce his new piece at the fundraiser, says, "This work is very important for me because it is the first time that I was able to exploit fully the grand color landscape of the harp. Part of my inspiration for The King David came from the idea of King David as a harpist, and thereby lies the subtitle of the work."

Glick explained that the first movement, In The Fields, is a reference to young King David as shepherd. The second movement, David and Saul, refers to the occasions when King Saul requested that David play the harp to soothe his troubled spirit during his sleepless nights. And the third movement, David the King, expresses the vibrant personality of the warrior-lover who also loves G-d with great passion and dances with unbridled joy before the Ark of the Lord.

Glick paid tribute to Loman and Swartz as "two of Canada's great musicians, who have done a great deal of voluntary work for these two organizations. And I commend Jennifer for doing this charitable work for such great causes."

Swartz began her harp studies in Toronto at the age of eight and earned a full scholarship to study with Loman at the Royal Conservatory of Music by the age of 11. She soon became principal harpist with the Toronto Youth Symphony, and her first radio broadcast at 14 was a solo recital for the 1986 CJRT Radio Recital Series. She made her solo debut with the TSO in 1988, performing in Toronto and on tour at the Calgary Winter Olympics Arts Festival.

While a student at Northern Secondary School, she received a full scholarship at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute of Music receiving her Artist's Diploma in 1992. She continued her studies with Loman while she was at McGill University. Shortly after, she won first prize in three American Harp Society Competitions and was the 1993 recipient of the Sinai Legacy Award administered by Toronto's Temple Sinai.

While still a student at McGill, she won the position of principal harpist with the Calgary Philharmonic Orchestra and after one year, she became the principal harpist with the Orchestre Symphonique de Montréal. Swartz made her solo debut at Carnegie Hall with the Montreal Symphony Orchestra in 1997.

Now settled in Montreal, Swartz joined the faculty at McGill as a harp instructor and she also maintains a private harp studio.

"I want to continue doing just what I am doing, enjoying an active career as a harp soloist, orchestral musician, chamber artist and teacher," she says.

MUSIC FROM THE GHETTO

The creativity of Jewish artists flourished even in the Nazi-run ghettos of Poland and Lithuania. Ghetto Tango: Music in Extremis presents the songs and music they composed and performed in those unlikely ghetto theatres and cabarets. They are songs of hope, songs satirical, music operatic and in the ragtime, jazz and tango mode.

Featuring Adrienne Cooper and Zalmen Mlotek, this riveting Yiddish/English show captivated packed houses when it played in Toronto at Ashkenaz 97. Courtesy of Olive Eye Productions, it is returning to Toronto for one performance only.

March 28, 8:30 p.m., Trinity-St. Paul's Centre, 427 Bloor St. W. at the Spadina subway. $25-$20, 324-9413.

Harpist Jennifer Swartz to perform Glick tune

Julea Gasner, coordinator of special events for the Reena Foundation says that Reena serves some 1,000 clients at The Toby and Harry Battle Development Centre in Thornhill. Currently, Reena has more than 114 residential locations serving 225 people on a full-time basis.

HAADD sponsors speaker meetings and workshops, and volunteers are working to provide conferences for people with autism which will focus on issues that affect their lives and help provide support for parents.

"Without community support," says Gasner, Reena and HAADD cannot provide the level of service we now provide and we cannot expand our programs which are very needed. We are thrilled that Jennifer will be performing at this wonderful evening."

An Enchanting Evening takes place March 19 at 8 p.m. at Walter Hall, Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto, 80 Queens Park Cr. For more information call 905-889-6484

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

DEAD SEA KIBBUTZ THRIVES AT EIN GEDI

"What I want you to remember," says Daniela Cohen, a member of the Ein Gedi kibbutz, "is that 40 years ago there was nothing here except the mountain, the sky and the sea."

Cohen, who was born in Vancouver and grew up in California, raised a family of eight children on this Dead Sea kibbutz, which was founded by a group of idealistic Israeli army vets. Today some 300 adults and nearly as many children are permanent residents here.

Ein Gedi appears like a mirage in the middle of the Judean desert, a lush subtropical paradise of date and palm trees, vegetation, thick green lawns – and water, precious water, everywhere.

Sprinklers are going full blast on the lawns and water is dribbling out of every garden hose as Cohen escorts us through the property, showing us the residences, the nursery compound, the guest units, the public dining room, the swimming pools, the large theatre.

She leads us to a chain-link fence and points out the palm plantation in the valley, and beyond that, the Judean hills that are the source of Ein Gedi's water.

Situated on the site of an ancient oasis, the kibbutz has more than enough water for its drinking and agricultural needs and it bottles the water commercially under the name M'Ein Gedi.

Ein Gedi's main income comes from its 230 guest rooms, its well-equipped spa and its famous line of moisturizers, lotions and shampoos, known as Ahava, made with Dead Sea black mud and sold around the world.

Kibbutzniks also raise some 30,000 turkeys annually, run a commercial film development lab and have developed a substance known as Ein Gal, which is stronger than conventional rubber and may have significant military use.

Ein Gedi also boasts thermal springs, a camel farm and the largest cactus garden in the Middle East. Although somewhat rocky, the Dead Sea beach nearby is one of the country's most popular, and visitors freely enjoy bathing in the mineral-rich mud. The area also boasts a hidden waterfall, which Cohen says "is really beautiful – as close to God as you're going to get."

Another nearby cataract is known as David's Waterfall. Biblical scholars have identified it as the place where the youth David hid overnight from King Saul (I Samuel, 24). Many ancient coins and Israel's oldest menorah were found in the area.

Archeologists have identified numerous ancient and biblical sites, including a mosaic floor bearing the names of the Jewish patriarchs along with the signs of the zodiac.

"This was the border between Jordan and Israel until 1967. There were no roads here, there was nothing here. We were told that nothing was going to grow here because the soil was so salty. But the wonderful phosphates that were in the Dead Sea make everything here grow better, sweeter, faster, lovelier," Cohen says.

Once covered by the much-larger Dead Sea of prehistoric times, the soil here formerly yielded the country's best tomatoes and still delivers superb mangoes, palmellos and dates. The site was first settled by agriculturalists who grew crops on the mountainside as much as 6,000 years ago.

Certainly the kibbutz movement as a whole has experienced financial difficulties in recent years, and Ein Gedi, like the others, has had to be flexible and adapt with the times. But this most famous of Israel's roughly 270 kibbutzim remains an undeniable success story, a testament to the hard work and idealism of its founders. It is a spirit that lives on in residents like Cohen.

She stands beneath a large tree. "This is my favorite tree on the kibbutz," she says. "It's a baobab tree from east Africa. This is the only place in Israel where they grow. One night several years ago, it was uprooted by the wind. The next morning members of the kibbutz put it back into the ground and secured it with rocks and it grew again. That is exactly what our kibbutz is all about, and what Israel is all about."

Hoops Hawks swoop down on Netivot Panthers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bring on da Bulls.

Okay, maybe da Baby Bulls, the pint-sized variety.

Last week, the vertically-challenged Danilack Hawks rode a fast-breaking offence and accurate shooting from the field to a 55-40 victory over the Netivot Panthers to capture the championship of the Jewish schools basketball league. The game was played at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) before a packed house of partisan onlookers who crowded the sidelines and kept up a noise level you'd expect at a Spice Girls concert.

The teams responded with a spirited, give-all-you-got performance, but in the end, the Hawks prevailed, pulling off something of an upset.

A 7-5, third-place team during the regular season, the Hawks got hot when it counted. In the semi-final they turned back the Bayview Warriors, last year's champs, by a score of 53-42 and they followed it up with a convincing title victory against the Panthers, who led the league with an 11-1 mark.

The championship game had plenty of drama, as the underdog Hawks had lost to the Panthers twice during the regular season.

Mid way through the title contest, it appeared the regular season pattern was unfolding yet again, said Hawks' coach Shawn Karry.

During the two earlier games, Danilack would jump into a double digit lead only to see the Panthers press hard and overtake them in the third quarter. In the championship game, it seemed like deja vu all over again. The Hawks jumped into a 17-10 first quarter lead and led 27-19 at the half.

In the third quarter, the Panthers appeared to be turning the tables again, chipping away at the lead and briefly going ahead by two.

But this time, the pattern did not hold. Karry said "we made some adjustments to speed things up. We put in some power forwards who can run and we started to fast break again."

Coupled with accurate shooting on the breaks, the Hawks pulled ahead for good early in the fourth quarter. They won going away.

The title win represented a big change from last season, when the Hawks finished fifth in the six-team league, out of the playoffs, Karry said.

Team speed is the biggest difference between this year's Hawks and last year' edition. "I have forwards who can run the floor now," Karry said.

At the other end of the court, Panthers' coach Mark Glatt was disappointed by the loss. The Panthers' 11-1 record was their best in the last four years and they had beaten the Hawks twice in the regular season. Glatt agreed the previous games' pattern looked like it was going to be played out in the championship game, "but this time, we didn't finish it off. In the fourth quarter, we didn't make our shots.

"I feel very bad for the kids," he said. "To quote one of our players, Ben Burke, 'we didn't come this far to lose'."

The Hawks were led in scoring by forward Jacob Weinstock with 20 points and guard Aaron Vale, who scored 17. The Panthers' best scorers were forward Ilan Ulmer, with 14 points, and guard Ben Rifkind, with 12.

The Jewish Basketball League is a seven-team circuit that includes the Hawks, Panthers, Bayview Warriors, the Hurwich Hurricanes, the Bathurst Lightning and teams from Bialik and Leo Baeck.

The Inside Back

The universe is expanding and so am I

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

I was relieved to read that a recent astronomers' conference concluded that the universe was in fact continuing to expand, rather than starting to contract. You see, I've been experiencing my own kind of equatorial spatial expansion recently. Is this what they mean by "going global"?

Now, some of this may still stem from Chanukah's gastronomic excesses. It could also be due to my habit of finishing my kids' leftovers. (What else are parents for?) Or could it have something to do with those "all-you-can-eat" kosher buffets (i.e., any simchah)?

It also seems my extra indulgences on Shabbat have caught up with me – that, or my metabolism has completely stalled. Funny, I always thought that the extra appetite was due to my neshamah yeteira (the figurative extra soul we gain on Shabbat); I just somehow assumed that come havdalah, the neshamah would take with it the extra caloric gain, rather than leaving it all behind (literally). The least the neshamah could do would be to burn off the extra calories before returning, all svelte and hungry, the next week.

There comes a time in every man's life when he has to finally admit he isn't 18 anymore and his waist isn't the same size either. How does he know? When he can't wait to slip into sweat pants when he comes home. When he starts adjusting how low he wears his pants so his belly can get some additional "freedom." When he knows that the belt holding up his pants is totally unnecessary. When he's no longer a candidate for that "tapered" shirt look. When he realizes that it's impossible for all his clothes to keep shrinking in the laundry every week. When he notices his suit jackets getting tighter and no longer assumes that he's added extra muscle.

I instinctively knew that in the long run, I needed more exercise and a healthier diet. In the short run, however, I was faced with three difficult choices. Plan A meant continuing with Tight Pants Syndrome, which was becoming more painful and obvious with each passing day. Plan B was to get my current pants let out, a prospect that represented defeat yet carried with it the faint hope that maybe one day I would need to have them taken in. Okay, all you males who ever had pants let out then taken back in raise your hands. Hello, is anybody out there? On to Plan C.

Plan C was to buy some new clothes. (What, replace everything?) Now I don't buy new clothes all that frequently, so my experience was all that more traumatic. I agonized for half an hour: Do I buy pants in my nostalgic waist size or in the "globally enhanced" size?

The sales clerks were probably confused by my apparent indecision, but I discovered that denial is a key ingredient in the shmatte industry. They're no fools, they've noticed we're all getting larger too. It's a little known secret that the women's clothing manufacturers have been increasing the standard dimensions over the years, so that a size 6 dress of 20 years ago equals the size 8 of today, but at least the wearer can convince herself that she's still a size 6. Neat trick, eh?

Of course we men would never fall for such a ploy, we're too smart for that. So imagine my delight to discover that all men's clothes are now redesigned as "roomier" or "relaxed fit" (read baggy) for our "more active lifestyles" – the kind of clothes you can run in, or do cartwheels and triple somersaults in, just like in the television commercials. Maybe even a triathlon.

I can't remember my last triathlon, never mind my last somersault. Does bending down to tie shoe laces count? So for me, it's back to Plan B, and time to get to the tailor's for those much-needed alterations. Then again, those "stretchy waist" pants don't look half bad either…

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I already have a resume, but I hate it. I also already have a job, but my contract will end this May. I'd like to revamp my resume, so I'm sending it to you. Would you give me some suggestions?

Dear Reader,

Everybody should have their resume critiqued once in a while! I hope you will be happy with my suggestions. These suggestions are pretty general and will be useful to anyone who wants to update or change their resume.

Your resume is now only one page long. You've got your basic work and education history, but it's not doing much for you. First off, put your name, full address, phone number and e-mail, if you have one, at the top of the page. Use larger letters than those in the rest of the resume.

Then put your work experience second, because in your case, it's more recent than your education. (If your education was more recent, it would be the other way around.)

When you write down your experience, state what you did. If you created a new curriculum for a course you are teaching, or if you do conflict management or counselling with your students, include that in your job description.

Write your tasks in point form and remember to use verbs and adjectives. This section of your resume should virtually sing with the many skills and talents you have displayed on the job.

Your education should follow this. List the degree first, then the name of the school that granted the degree and where that school is located. The most recent degree is first. If you have additional certificates or qualifications, you can either note them here or you can create a new heading just below.

You should then have a section for your volunteer work. This would look better if you wrote it in point form rather than in a paragraph.

Some people like to have a section for interests or activities and I believe it always adds to a resume, because it shows a person's character. I would really like to see this type of section in your resume.

Finally, some people write "References available upon request" along the bottom of their resumes. Others actually list references on theirs. Sometimes one method is preferred over the other by the employer; check with the employer you apply to before you send the resume in.

It is fine to have a two-page resume, so let your creative juices flow and best of luck!

Israel offers to leave Lebanon

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu offered to withdraw from Lebanon if the Lebanese government provides the requisite security backup. He based the proposal on UN Security Council Resolution 425.

The apparent policy shift could be detected by the omission of Syria from Netanyahu's frame of reference. He did not make the pullback contingent on Damascus' consent or define it as a by-product of a projected peace treaty with Syria.

"If the government of Lebanon cooperates with us in the establishment of appropriate security arrangements in southern Lebanon, we will be delighted to depart from Lebanon in the framework of implementation of Resolution 425," Netanyahu told the cabinet.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai elaborated on Netanyahu's formulation by saying: "The IDF will continue to operate in southern Lebanon and to defend the northern border settlements. At the same time, the government accepts UN Resolution 425 according to its interpretation, namely that the government of Lebanon will act to assure its control in Lebanon and prevent hostile activities against Israel from being perpetrated from Lebanon."

But the Syrian aspect was not totally eliminated from the picture.

Cabinet secretary Dan Naveh and Netanyahu's foreign policy adviser, Uzi Arad, reportedly were in Paris because of diplomatic signals that Syria is interested in renewing negotiations.

A French Foreign Ministry spokesperson said he knew nothing of the visit, but French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine said France is willing to do what it can to help any dialogue.

"We could offer a service to Israel, Lebanon, and Syria, because the three questions are interlocked, and they know this," he said.

Netanyahu and Mordechai are expected to press the government's case on Lebanon in separate trips to Europe this week. Netanyahu will be visiting Norway, which has peacekeepers in south Lebanon. Mordechai has plans to travel to France, which has longstanding interests in Lebanon and is a member of the Grapes of Wrath monitoring committee.

Science Minister Michael Eitan welcomed Netanyahu's stand, describing it as a substantive change in Israel's position.

"We will defend the northern part of our country from the international border," Eitan said.

An official source said Netanyahu's statement "certainly is a change in position." He contended that until this change came about, the conventional wisdom was that "we are in a peace process and that the moment the Syrian channel

London shuls hit by arson

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — A local man has been charged with arson following attacks against two synagogues in this southwest Ontario town.

The attacks last Thursday have left some members of London's small Jewish community shaken.

The two synagogues were slightly damaged, but fire officials said the damage could have been far worse.

The first incident took place last Thursday morning when a passerby phoned in a report of a fire outside Congregation Or Shalom, a Conservative synagogue on Huron Street, in London's north end.

Firefighters discovered a packet of combustible material, including twigs, paper and a long-burning fire log.

After they extinguished the fire and were returning to the station, the crew saw smoke coming from the side and rear of Congregation Beth Tefilah, an Orthodox synagogue a block away, on Adelaide Street.

There, they discovered two similar boxes also containing paper, twigs and artificial fire logs. Both fires were quickly extinguished.

Damage caused by the blazes has been estimated at between $500 and $600.

"We are exhausted and concerned," a tired-sounding Avraham Santopinto, president of the 90-family Congregation Beth Tefilah, told The CJN in a phone interview.

Israeli commandos in Iraq — please see page 35

The News in Brief

ISRAEL

Internet Monitoring

JERUSALEM — Israel might cut back on the security information available on the country's Internet sites. At a hearing on the matter last week before the Knesset research and development committee, a member of Knesset said he was shocked to see the amount of information available on the Israeli air force site.

The Knesset is also considering monitoring pornography on the Internet.

Mossad Mistake

JERUSALEM — Two Mossad agents were arrested in Geneva for attempting to spy on an embassy there, Swiss media have reported.

Swiss diplomatic sources confirmed that the arrests took place, but there were conflicting reports as to whether the agents were attempting to spy on the Iraqi or the Iranian Embassy in Geneva.

Israeli media reported that the failure of a Mossad operation in western Europe led in part to the resignation of the head of the foreign intelligence agency, Danny Yatom.

West Bank Status

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is intent on holding on to some 64 percent of the West Bank, regardless of how much land the United States calls on Israel to turn over as part of a further redeployment, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported.

"There could be five American plans," the newspaper quoted Netanyahu as saying. "We need the territory in order to have something to bargain with in the final-status talks."

WORLD

Iraqi Scuds

LONDON — Israeli commandos operating behind Iraqi lines have found evidence of Scud missiles, according to the London-based newsletter Foreign Report.

The Israelis have been operating in Iraq's western desert – which Iraq used as a launching pad for 39 Scud attacks on Israel during the 1991 Gulf War – in a bid to reduce the chances of a new Scud attack in case of renewed fighting in the Gulf.

Anti-Semitic Group

NEW YORK — An obscure anti-Semitic group is causing a stir in South Florida.

The World Church of the Creator scattered fliers into yards in Hollywood, Fla., asking readers to join the "most positive influence on white society," and directing them to the group's anti-Semitic Web site.

Clinton and Child Care

WASHINGTON — Twenty-five years after the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) issued a landmark study exposing the child-care crisis in America, President Bill Clinton turned to the group last week in his effort to build support for his child care initiative and broader educational goals.

In his first personal appearance before a Jewish convention since his second term began, Clinton praised the group's work in promoting these issues.

Clinton's decision to speak to the organization was seen at least in part as an effort to recognize the pioneering work the 90,000-member NCJW has done in placing the child care issue on the nation's agenda.

Model UN

NEW YORK — Students from a number of Jewish schools in Canada were chosen for the eighth annual Yeshiva University National Model United Nations. Over 500 yeshivah high school students competed in the three-day conference.

Students came from Bnai Akiva Schools and CHAT in Toronto and Joseph Wolinksy Collegiate in Winnipeg.

Trial Date Set

MOSCOW — A date has been set for the war crimes trial of a Lithuanian accused of being a Nazi collaborator.

Aleksandras Lileikis, 91, was set to go on trial March 4. Lileikis is suspected of having handed Jews over to Nazi death squads during World War II, when he was a deputy head of the Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian security police.

During the Nazi occupation of Lithuania from 1941 to 1944, about 94 percent of Lithuania's pre-war Jewish community of 240,000 died in the Holocaust.

Historians say the scale of the tragedy could have been smaller had ordinary Lithuanians not helped with the killings.

Latvian Apology

MOSCOW — Latvia's president has again apologized for his country's role in the Holocaust.

Guntis Ulmanis, who is on a three-day visit to Israel, said at a reception at the home of President Ezer Weizman that the Baltic nation is aware that some of its citizens persecuted Latvian Jews during World War II.

Rabbis: Couple Must Divorce

JERUSALEM — A group of Israeli rabbis has ruled that a haredi man must divorce his wife, a victim of rape, even though the couple wants to stay together, according to an Israeli newspaper report.

The couple has nine children.

The Yediot Achronot report said the woman, who lives in the town of Bnei Brak, was raped three weeks ago by three men as she was leaving a mikvah, or ritual bath.

She did not report the event to the police, but did tell her husband, who sought the advice of rabbis on what to do.

The husband is a kohen, a descendant of the priests of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem. Under Halachah (Jewish law), a kohen must divorce his wife if she has been raped.

Some halachic authorities say the husband could have gotten around the law by saying that he did not believe his wife, but by seeking the advice of the rabbis he implicitly admitted that he did believe her.

"The Halachah as reported is correct," said Rabbi J. David Bleich, professor of Jewish law and ethics at Cardozo Law School in New York.

But since a woman is unable to prove her own rape, the rabbis could have advised the husband that he "is under no obligation to believe her."

Toronto Conservative rabbi chaired Israel assembly

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite the uncertain future of the Ne'eman Committee proposals, Rabbi Philip Scheim was upbeat on his recent return from Israel, where he chaired the mid-February convention of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), the umbrella group for Conservative rabbis.

Please see related stories pages 9, 14

Rabbi Scheim admitted to being disappointed over the "very hostile language" in the statement issued by Israel's Chief Rabbinical Council. The document rejected the Ne'eman Committee's proposal for a central conversion institute that would allow Reform and Conservative rabbis to help educate potential converts, but would not give them licence to perform conversions.

Rabbi Philip Scheim

Rabbi Scheim was gratified, however, that the Masorti (Conservative) movement has penetrated Israel's consciousness and he was optimistic about Masorti's future in Israel.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who addressed the convention, urged the rabbis not to give up hope on the conversion issue. Other convention participants included journalists, members of Knesset, Orthodox rabbis and academics.

Among the optional programs was a 90-minute meeting at Yeshivat Alon Shvut with two representatives of Meimad, an organization of moderate Orthodox rabbis in Israel.

Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, told The CJN that, having participated in the meeting, he now envisions Conservative and Orthodox rabbis working together in Israel as "not only a possibility but an achievable goal."

"The Ne'eman committee wasn't why we were in Israel," clarified Rabbi Scheim, "although we all felt – and the Israeli rabbis even more so – that we couldn't have planned a better time to be there." Morale among participants was very high, he said.

The convention, more often held in the United States, was scheduled four years ago to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary.

An opening-night program at the Hyatt Regency Jerusalem set the tone as tribute was paid to RA members who served in Israel's wars, and Israeli entertainer Dudu Fisher performed.

The three-day convention, of which Rabbi Scheim was the first Canadian chair, was conducted in Hebrew to indicate the international aspect of the American-based RA and its relevance in Israel.

Of the 360 rabbis at the convention, about 100 were from Israel (representing two-thirds of Israeli members). There were half a dozen Canadians, all from Toronto. The majority were American, with a few from South America, England and Germany.

It was the largest registration for an RA convention held outside North America, said Rabbi Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

"Throughout the convention, people made the point that we're not anti-Orthodox," he said. "We want there to be a respectful relationship. We admire Orthodoxy, [but] we have our difficulties with the official Orthodox establishment in Israel. In a pluralistic religious environment, we want Orthodoxy to thrive. I think it's better for the Orthodox, as well, if people feel they're able to choose."

Israel has "thousands of people who, on Jewish humanitarian grounds, need to be converted," said Rabbi Scheim. "We're talking about Russian olim, most of whom will not qualify for an Orthodox conversion because they're not observant. We feel if they want to be in the army and make their life in Israel, that earns them the right to be Jewish.

"And non-Orthodox Israelis who adopt babies overseas are destined to have children who are gentiles according to the state, because the rabbinate won't convert them. It's a serious moral issue.

"If the Orthodox rabbinate is not prepared to perform such conversions because it compromises their standards, we're prepared to do it."

An added negative for the Masorti movement, in the wake of the Ne'eman proposals, is that it has come to be associated with "court cases, legal challenges and confrontations."

For that reason, convention organizers made a "difficult but firm decision" not to include a visit to the Kotel (Western Wall) on the convention agenda.

> We want there to be a respectful relationship with Orthodoxy

"It's very hard to imagine a rabbinic conference not visiting the Kotel," said Rabbi Scheim. "Unfortunately, visits to the Kotel in the past have been confrontational. We clearly did not want our conference to be in any way involved in confrontation or protest. Our point was to make a positive religious statement."

The majority of the RA rabbis are egalitarian, said Rabbi Scheim, who is traditional. His convention committee included two female rabbis. About 20 participants were women, two of whom spoke at plenary sessions. (Membership in the RA is predominantly male, in large part because the Conservative movement began to ordain women only in the mid-1980s.)

"Those who want to be egalitarian, are. Those who don't are left in peace. We don't impose one view on the movement. Rabbis are encouraged to follow their own understanding of Halachah and their own conscience."

The only controversy at the convention, Rabbi Scheim said, was over a resolution proposed by a minority of the Israeli rabbis, which was "harshly critical" of the chief rabbinate. It was not passed.

The next step for the Masorti movement is to "stop being the best-kept secret in Israel," said Rabbi Scheim.

"We have a lot to offer that segment of the Israeli population who are termed secular but have traditional inclinations and who are interested in making a religious connection without all of the stringencies of Israeli establishment Orthodoxy."

A key point, ungrasped

Last week, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu publicly proposed that he and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat meet with the American administration in a Camp David-style summit, cloistered away from the intruding pens, microphones and cameras of the media, to cobble together some agreed-upon basis for a final status agreement.

After consulting for 24 hours with his top advisors, Arafat rejected the proposal, pretentiously declaring that he prefers to see the Israeli prime minister honor current peace treaty obligations rather than to fashion new ones with him.

I deliberately use the adverb "pretentiously" because this constant refrain by Arafat of unpunished Israeli violations of Oslo is indeed a pretension. He delights in prescribing strict contractual liability for Israel, while utterly disdaining any for himself.

And because the refrain is so frequently echoed by an uncritical, even enthusiastic chorus of others, the chairman will not likely soon sing a different refrain.

Two often-touted examples of Israeli "violations" of Oslo are the Western Wall Tunnels and Har Choma, the former having been described as an "illegal expansion of the tunnels under the Muslim part of Old Jerusalem," and the latter as the "building of a new Jewish settlement in Arab east Jerusalem." Both are false accusations.

The Western Wall tunnels do not encroach onto any Muslim religious institution, nor were they expanded into a Muslim neighborhood. Similarly, Har Choma is not in Arab East Jerusalem. It is a hilltop in the south of Jerusalem between the neighborhood of Gilo and Kibbutz Ramat Rachel. To be sure, it has strategic value for both Israel and the Palestinians. For Israel it closes a ring of Jewish neighborhoods between Jerusalem and Bethlehem. For the Palestinians it opens a corridor from Bethlehem to Jerusalem. Thus, it is no surprise that there are competing claims to the hill. But anyone who merely looks at the shrub-laden promontory, can clearly see it is not in Arab east Jerusalem.

If there are violations of Oslo, they are surely on both sides.

Let us briefly examine one of Oslo's most vital provisions. It is a provision which the PA flouts. Under the terms of the original Oslo agreement, the letters exchanged pursuant to that agreement and the subsequent Hebron protocol, the PA promised not to incite hatred or violence against Israel.

In my view, the promise not to incite violence or feelings of hatred and ill will against the other party is one of the most important in the entire structure and framework of the peace accords. Both sides agreed that they "shall seek to foster mutual understanding and tolerance and shall accordingly abstain from incitement, including hostile propaganda, against each other and, without derogating from the principle of freedom of expression, shall take legal measures to prevent such incitement by any organizations, groups or individuals within their jurisdiction."

This provision is the foundation stone upon which will be built, if at all, a new relationship between the two peoples.

The obligation on the parties is not only a negative one, namely, to desist from incitement, but it also encompasses a positive obligation to actively "foster mutual understanding and tolerance."

The protocol does not call for affection between the parties. That would be unrealistic in the extreme and downright silly. It does, however, call for the attempt to develop a sense of understanding and tolerance between the peoples.

The relationship between the two peoples must stand high above and long past the relationship between their leaders, strained and untrusting as it may be from time to time.

If Israelis and Palestinians are destined to live side by side (my emphasis) they can only do so, in the long run, on the basis of the fundamentals underlying all good relations: understanding and tolerance.

Arafat seems incapable of grasping the importance for the future of his own people of fostering good relations with the people of Israel.

In his eagerness to discredit Netanyahu in Palestinian and western eyes, Arafat sanctions the most odious expressions of vile, crude, tasteless anti-Semitism against Israelis and Jews by his officials and journalists.

These official utterings by PA spokespersons unequivocally violate the terms of the Oslo and subsequent accords.

But they are more than mere technical violations of these seminal agreements. They violate the possibility of a future of tolerant, if not harmonious, coexistence between Palestinians and Israelis.

They betray any sense of confidence and trust in the peace process that even the most dovish of Israelis must feel deep in their hearts before the process can advance.

They ultimately destroy the will to make peace.

Rather than educate his people in the ways of peace, he propagates hateful myths.

Rather than establish for his people an entirely new emotional, psychological and cultural paradigm of coexistence, he perpetuates in them fear and loathing of Israelis.

After Purim, in this space, I shall excerpt only a small sampling of some of the re-propagated anti-Semitism emanating from the PA against Israel and against Jews.

Hate crimes up in Toronto, police report

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A total of 187 hate crime incidents were reported in Toronto in 1997, including 28 in which Jews were the victims, according to an annual survey released last week by the Toronto police hate crimes unit.

Anti-Semitism up in Winnipeg

please see page 23

Jews were most often victims of mischief or threats. Blacks, who experienced 50 incidents of hate-motivated crimes, were the most frequently victimized group, usually through assaults, the report noted.

Last year's total represented a seven percent rise over 1996 but it is a far cry from the numbers recorded in 1994 and 1995, the peak years for hate motivated crimes since the hate crimes unit began recording occurrences in 1993. In that year, 155 occurrences were reported but in 1994, 249 incidents were reported while the figure for 1995 was 302.

"Since 1993, particular groups have been consistently targeted in hate motivated crime," the report states. "Black people, members of the Jewish faith, South Asians, the gay community and Asians are most frequently victimized."

The report indicated that since 1993, Jews have been targeted 190 times out of a total of 1,068 occurrences.

In 1997, the trend of previous years continued with assaults (41.7 percent) the most frequently reported offence, followed by mischief (27.8 percent).

"There were five groups identified as associated to or members of organized hate groups. These groups include the Aryan Blitzkrieg, Polska (Polish) Skinheads, Brotherhood of Protection, Heritage Front and the Lincoln, Nebraska New World Order. These groups were responsible for 10 percent of the total occurrences for 1997. This is a significant increase in organized hate group activity compared to previous years. Organized hate groups are forming alliances and becoming more covert in their operations," the report indicated.

Despite that disturbing trend, the report pointed out that "the majority of occurrences appear to be spontaneous conflicts between members of the general public who are not connected with organized hate groups."

Last week's report came about one month after B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights issued its annual audit of anti-Semitic incidents. The League reported that anti-Semitic incidents dropped last year. Det. Sgt. Mike Federico, who heads the Toronto police intelligence division, said the discrepancy arises because the League "measures all incidents of hate. We focus on incidents that can be categorized as crimes." In addition, the League includes incidents from across Canada while last week's report focused on Toronto.

One of the higher profile incidents included in the police report occurred outside the Lido Motel last summer when white supremacists picketed Roma Gypsies who had recently arrived from Europe. Seven people were charged with promoting hate. The alleged perpetrators were members of Aryan Blitzkrieg and Polska Skinheads, the report states. Their cases are before the court.

Federico described several other high profile occurrences. In one, members of a hate group assaulted a television cameraman who was covering the sentencing of another member of the group.

A third case was "a classic unprovoked assault of a black citizen coming to a restaurant bar for a meal. He was assaulted by someone we believe connected with a hate group," Federico said.

A fourth case involved the distribution of hate propaganda targeting the Muslim community. Following an investigation by the hate crimes unit, a suspect was arrested and charged with three counts of wilfully promoting hatred. That case is currently before the courts.

Twenty-four hate-related incidents were reported on school property, the report indicated, but Federico pointed out they can occur anywhere, including the soccer pitch.

At one game, a player was heard taunting another by saying "'we killed you back home, we'll kill you here,'" said Sgt. Dino Doria, who heads the police hate crimes unit. Parents came to that game armed with baseball bats and two by fours. After the game, one of the goalies required 80 stitches. Both teams were eventually kicked out of the soccer league in which they played, he added.

Federico and Doria said the hate crimes unit is actively involved in encouraging tolerance among young people and in training other police officers to recognize hate-motivated crimes when they investigate occurrences.

War criminal lied to get citizenship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court judge ruled last week that Nazi war criminal Wasily Bogutin repeatedly lied about his wartime activities, and obtained Canadian citizenship by fraud or misrepresentation. The finding opens the door for the federal cabinet to strip the 88-year-old Toronto resident of his citizenship as a prelude to his deportation from Canada.

In a 62-page decision released last week, Federal Court Judge William McKeown found that Bogutin volunteered for an auxiliary police unit in Selidovo, Ukraine that collaborated with invading German forces.

In his capacity as an investigator with the police unit, Bogutin was "involved in rounding up people for forced labor in Germany." But "there was no evidence linking him directly with any executions," McKeown stated.

Bogutin is one of 14 alleged Nazi war criminals that federal Justice Department and Immigration authorities are seeking to deport. Three of the men died before their cases were concluded and two others have agreed to leave Canada rather than face trial.

A large part of the evidence-gathering in the Bogutin case was conducted in Ukraine last summer. McKeown noted that "much of Mr. Bogutin's evidence with respect to his involvement in the auxiliary police was contradicted by several witnesses in Ukraine." Their evidence, including the testimony of Bogutin's own daughter, led him to reject Bogutin's contention he was merely a civilian warehouseman working for the police, McKeown said.

He accepted other evidence that Bogutin was a police investigator and that "investigators gave police instructions on arresting people, and also gave orders to regular policemen to bring people to the police station where they would be interrogated by investigators."

McKeown noted that "German documents indicated the auxiliary police were involved in [rounding up laborers], and that Jews were guarded and shot by the Ukrainian auxiliary police as well.

However, the Germans arranged for police from a town other than Selidovo to do the actual executions. It appears that the local police were involved in guarding the area of the executions but did not actually participate in the executions."

One of the Ukrainian witnesses, a former member of the Selidovo police, testified that the 1942 shootings of a Jewish family and two others was a public event. "Many people in the town of Selidovo had seen signs advertising the executions. They knew there would be a shooting of Jews at a certain time and place and that people could come and watch." However, none of the witnesses identified Bogutin as being present, McKeown added.

Further testimony painted a picture of the local auxiliary police as brutish collaborators. "Several witnesses testified as to seeing beatings, arrests and roundups by the auxiliary police. D'Yachenko testified that people of the village were afraid of [the] police because for any minor offence there was immediate punishment such as shooting, imprisonment or whipping. He also testified to seeing people being escorted from the police building to the trench where executions took place and stated that one could clearly hear the sound of shooting," McKeown wrote.

McKeown noted that various postwar documents completed at Bogutin's request indicated his home was in Romania, not in Ukraine. He rejected Bogutin's claim that the creators of the documents got it wrong when he told them he was from Ukraine.

"There is no way that he could have given information which was consistently misunderstood. In my view, from the time he retreated from Ukraine, he was deliberately hiding his place of birth and residence during the 1941-43 period in Selidovo."

McKeown found that Bogutin also lied when he married for the third time in Villach, Austria after the war. He falsified the marriage registry by indicating he had been married only once before, when in fact, he had abandoned his second wife in Selidovo when he retreated with German forces in 1943.

McKeown also found that Bogutin "falsified his place of birth and nationality in obtaining documents from governmental authorities in Austria and France after the war. I find he falsely presented himself to the International Refugee Organization (IRO) as a Romanian national. I also find he falsely presented himself to Canadian authorities as a Romanian national and concealed his wartime activities from Canadian authorities."

And he rejected Bogutin's claim that he joined the police to provide a cover for himself because his father was Jewish. "Mr. Bogutin was not raised as a Jew...No one in Selidovo knew he was Jewish and he never practiced as a Jew," McKeown found.

In the wake of McKeown's judgment, Jewish organizations urged federal authorities to act quickly to deport Bogutin. "The federal cabinet should immediately revoke his citizenship in order for deportation proceedings to begin," said Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crime committee.

"We hope this development will provide the additional momentum necessary to carry forward with the remaining cases still to be heard."

"With the findings of Justice McKeown, everything from here on in is a matter of procedure, not substance," said David Matas, B'nai Brith's honorary senior legal counsel.

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said the paperwork outlining recommendations to strip Bogutin of citizenship is being prepared. He expected the process to take from four to six weeks.

Meanwhile, the case involving Peters Vitols continues in a Toronto court while the case of Serge Kisluk has moved to Lutsk, Ukraine to hear testimony from witnesses there. The case of Vladimir Katriuk will travel to Lviv, Ukraine on a similar mission in about two weeks, Vickery said.

Israel mishandled Iraq crisis: Sprinzak

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — By its actions during the recent Iraqi crisis, the Israeli government inadvertently whipped up an atmosphere of hysteria in the country, claims an Israeli expert in Middle East affairs.

"The government created unnecessary hysteria and panic," declared Ehud Sprinzak, a Hebrew University political science professor, in an interview last week.

Israel should neither have distributed new gas masks nor urged Israelis to buy plastic sheeting, masking tape, canned foods and bottled water, he said. He made his comments just hours before United Nations secretary general Kofi Annan defused the latest standoff over UN weapons inspections in Iraq.

He said that Saddam Hussein – the Iraqi leader – did not threaten Israel even once, and that the crisis never posed a serious existential threat to Israel.

"There [was] a huge difference between the present situation and the [1991] Gulf War," asserted Sprinzak, who was here under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and the First Narayever Congregation. "Israel was terrorized by its own leaders. This is such a disgrace. I feel ashamed of being an Israeli today. I feel so stupid."

Israel, he argued, should have announced weeks ago that the crisis was none of its business, that it had no belligerent intentions toward Iraq and that it had the means "to make it very costly for Saddam Hussein" if he fired missiles at Israeli cities.

In any event, the likelihood of an Iraqi attack against Israel was so slim that the government should not have taken these precautionary measures.

And even if there had been an Iraqi missile strike, the effect would have been insignificant, given Iraq's primitive weapon systems, Sprinzak noted.

But as a result of the panic that gripped Israel, Iraq has been able to add a new and important psychological weapon to its arsenal. And in the future, Iraq may well use it.

Turning to the stalled Oslo peace process, Sprinzak said that Israel, after 50 years of statehood, is strong and secure enough to offer the Palestinians "a fair deal" in a final settlement that would enable them to establish a "demilitarized entity" in some 90 percent of the West Bank.

He belittled the security interests maps recently presented to the Israeli cabinet by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon. Under their respective plans, Israel would retain either slightly more than half or about two-thirds of the West Bank following a final agreement.

"These maps are an exercise in power and in wishful thinking on the part of unrealistic Israelis. The Palestinians, even if they accept these maps, can't objectively or in reality live with them. These maps are not a realistic solution, but a time bomb from Israel's point of view."

He predicted that the Palestinians would eventually challenge Israel's conception of peace, and that this would spark "an explosion" of rampant Palestinian violence.

"The Palestinians don't have to win such a struggle militarily. All they need is saturation TV coverage of Israeli tanks destroying Palestinian villages and killing lots of civilians in order to have a devastating impact on international and Israeli public opinion.

"If this happens, the Israeli government won't be able to withstand U.S., international and domestic pressures, and therefore, there will be some kind of real diplomatic compromise."

Sprinzak, who has written a soon-to-be published book called Extremism and Violence in Israeli Politics From the Altalena Tragedy to the Rabin Assassination, said that Benjamin Netanyahu's political views are almost similar to those espoused by the radical right.

"Israel's extreme right is not comprised of crazies, but of very able and practical people who have a clear agenda: to put as many Jews as possible in Judea and Samaria, so that when a Palestinian entity is established it is minimal and doesn't endanger the Jewish hold over the West Bank. They have an enormous influence over Israeli foreign policy."

Netanyahu, he said, appears to support the Oslo process. But in fact, "he's creating conditions – settlements – to end Oslo. Netanyahu, in his heart of hearts, wants the whole process to collapse. He always said he didn't like the Oslo accords. That doesn't mean he's an enemy of peace. He just wants it on his own conditions."

The Olso accords will remain largely unimplemented as long as Israel refuses to make meaningful concessions to the Palestinians, said Sprinzak, who is currently on sabbatical at the U.S. Institute of Peace in Washington, D.C. "I'm very skeptical of the success of the Oslo talks."

CHAT gets new headmaster

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Shaviv, principal of Bialik High School in Montreal, has been appointed the new headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Shaviv, who will assume his new duties in September, will be replacing Rabbi Marvin Pachino, who is retiring after 19 years in the position.

Norman Grill, president of CHAT, said that Shaviv was chosen after a long search. "We felt he is the man to carry us into the future."

Grill praised Rabbi Pachino's contribution to the development of the school. "Under his leadership, CHAT went from an enrolment of 220 to a projected enrolment of over 800 for the coming year," he said, adding that he feels Shaviv will continue this trend.

Shaviv said he is excited at the new challenge. He and his family expect to move here in the summer.

Bold budget step

The federal budget presented last week to the country was noteworthy in more than the fact that for the first time in decades it was deficit-less. The Millennium Scholarship Fund was a very bold and imaginative initiative aimed at assisting Canadians wishing to pursue post-secondary education.

There was, of course, the usual criticism from certain provincial quarters, knee-jerk in its automatic predictability, that the initiative intrudes into provincial jurisdiction. But merely because the scholarship relates to a field within provincial jurisdiction, namely, post-secondary education, does not render it an intrusion. The initiative attaches to individuals, not to institutions or to programs or to policies of provincial legislatures. The initiative may have an impact on provincial institutions when, as a result of the availability of financial assistance, more students decide to enroll in universities and colleges. But this is to be desired and ultimately celebrated.

Increasing the availability of higher education for Canadians across the country is a national priority. Improving the quality of the avenues of that higher education for Canadians is a provincial priority.

In the next budget, we hope to see a similarly bold health care initiative.

A French connection

Lebanon is once again taking Israeli lives. Last week, three young IDF soldiers were killed when their outpost at Karkum in southern Lebanon was rocketed by the Hezbollah. Three other soldiers were hurt in the attack. Over the weekend, in a separate incident, four more soldiers were hurt.

Hezbollah has recently resorted to long-range bombing tactics to strike at the IDF for it is much harder to attack at close range due to operational changes implemented by the IDF in the field.

The IDF is in south Lebanon to protect the citizens who live in Israel's north. If the safety of these citizens were guaranteed by the government of Lebanon, Israeli forces would quit the narrow security strip it now daily patrols.

That was the essence of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's remarks to a gathering of Canadian visitors last week. "We have no qualms with [Security Council] Resolution 425 that talks about our departure from Lebanon," he said. Apart from the soldiers of Israel, however, only the president of Syria, not the government of Lebanon, can provide those safeguards to the citizens of northern Israel. Iran may be Hezbollah's sponsor, but Syria is their governor. Hezbollah operates in Lebanon at the pleasure of President Hafez al-Assad. He controls the shipments of their arms. He grants them the freedom to strike at the Jewish state.

Thus, for peace to be restored to northern Israel and to southern Lebanon, Hezbollah must relinquish its campaign against Israel. For that to happen, Syria must rein them in. But, as we know, Assad will only use his Hezbollah pawn when it brings him closer to checkmate.

In the past few days, there have been rumors of a Syrian "signal" to Israel that it wishes to resume peace talks. It is, of course, in Israel's specific interests to pursue such talks with Syria whenever possible and feasible. It is also in the West's overall interests. Regional stability is vital to the West only slightly less than it is to the countries of the area. Therefore, the West must also constantly try to find ways to help nurture along the possibility of such talks.

To that end, perhaps the government of Canada might lend its good offices to the parties directly, or might prevail upon a European country with historic and current ties to Syria – France for example – to foster the resumption of direct Israeli-Syrian negotiations.

The Europeans resent that they play no role in the discussions between the Palestinians and Israel. Bringing about a determination by Syria that it should return to the table with Israel would be a worthy contribution to the possibility of peace in the Middle East.

Ignoring rule of law leads to chaos

I wish to speak out regarding the Supreme Court challenge on a unilateral declaration of independence by Quebec. It has been said that there is one and only one issue here, namely the political expression of a majority of the Quebec population in favor of independence, and that, and only that, should constitute the determining factor in deciding whether Quebec can secede from the Canadian federation. But one must ask what role is played by the Canadian Constitution and international law in determining the future of Quebec in Canada?

This is exactly what the Supreme Court challenge is being asked to explain. We must not ignore the rule of law and the consequences of not abiding by the rule of law. The question is not simply a matter of the political expression of the sovereign will of the Quebec people. The Quebec people are a highly heterogeneous population, and as things now stand, Quebec is part of the Canadian federation.

The basic, i.e., constitutional law of the land is not vested in the Quebec National Assembly but in the Canadian Constitution. Any change to that constitution that may come about as the result of a referendum in Quebec has to be made in accordance with the rule of law. To presume otherwise is to say that the basic law of the land is of no consequence and to invite everyone to flout the rule of law, which is a road to chaos.

We must not oppose democracy and the rule of law. If a vast majority of Quebecers are in favor of a clear-cut independence option, legal constraints in and of themselves would not suffice to block the popular will, and certainly not after an extensive period of negotiations in good faith. However, we have had two referendums organized by the PQ and both of them resulted in democratically expressed majorities in favor of Canadian federalism. In each case, the separatist forces have not respected that majority, but have set their sights on the next round. To cite Lucien Bouchard's own words after the last defeat of his option, "à la prochaine" seems to be the PQ definition of democracy.

I, like my colleagues in the Quebec Liberal party, have no doubt that the vast majority of Quebecers value membership in the Canadian federation above any other constitutional option for Quebec.

No double standard, no linkage

Sheldon Kirshner is accurate in asserting that the ambivalence exhibited by many Arabs toward the recent UN standoff with Saddam Hussein was caused by a perceived "double standard" in the treatment of Iraq vis-a-vis Israel ("Iraqi Crisis Simmers," Feb. 19). However, it is important to emphasize that this perception of a double standard bears no resemblance to reality. The cases of Iraq and Israel are completely different and warrant different treatment by the international community.

In 1990, Iraq invaded Kuwait without provocation. The UN Security Council imposed mandatory resolutions demanding Iraq's immediate and unconditional withdrawal. It subsequently passed additional resolutions demanding the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. By contrast, Israel came into possession of territories in 1967 while fighting a war of self-defence. Security Council Resolution 242 (of November 1967) recommended (but did not impose) a framework in which Israel would return some territory in exchange for permanent peace with its Arab neighbors.

Whereas the UN Security Council has imposed more than a dozen binding resolutions against Iraq since 1990, the council has never demanded Israel's unconditional withdrawal from territories taken in 1967. With regard to Lebanon, Israel has been trying to find a way to leave while still ensuring the security of its northern border. It was prepared to disengage in the context of a May 1983 agreement with the government of Lebanon; however, Beirut reneged under pressure from Syria. Recently, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai affirmed Israel's readiness to withdraw as long as the Lebanese government fulfilled its obligation (pursuant to UN Security Council Resolution 425 of 1978) to disarm militant factions and stabilize the border region.

Finally, there is the issue of "linkage." The standoff over UN arms inspections was caused solely by Saddam Hussein's reckless behavior, and it had absolutely nothing to do with Israel or Arab-Israeli relations.

There is no linkage between the cases of Iraq and Israel, Arab – and Israeli – frustration over peace negotiations notwithstanding.

Checking the records for Jewish servicemen

I recently read in The CJN an item about the creation of a comprehensive compilation of all Jewish personnel who served in the Canadian (and possibly other) forces during World War II.

I have just read the submission made in 1950 by Rabbi Samuel Cass in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of doctor of Hebrew literature, titled A Record of a Chaplain's Experience, World War II, 1942-1946.

On page 9, I was very interested to read the following: "In Canada, nominal rolls were submitted to my office from Naval Headquarters of the enlistments in the Naval branch of the Service, so that contact by means of correspondence was almost complete. Although the same service was supplied by Army records for enlistment in the Army, these lists proved more useful for the public relations program of the Jewish community in connection with the compilation of the War record than they did for actual contact."

Since Cass refers to the fact that there were three Jewish chaplains in the Royal Canadian Air Force, it is quite likely that the same type of listing was provided to them by the RCAF.

This may be a worthwhile approach to the matter of obtaining authoritative documentation of enlistments of Jewish personnel in all three services.

Orthodox community should endorse Ne'eman

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Jews from around the world have been watching, if not carefully, at least caringly, as the Ne'eman Committee has attempted to broker a "just and lasting" arrangement for issues that have threatened to unravel the partnership that Israel has maintained with Jews everywhere.

The Ne'eman Committee has actually put forward a formula for conversions in Israel that incorporates the Conservative and Reform streams in the educational process leading up to application for conversion, and at the same time preserves the halachic status quo on the conversion process itself.

As is by now well known, no sooner was the report of the committee released than a group of highly influential rabbis in Israel, 10 in all, publicly rejected it.

The impression was left that the committee's recommendations are favored by the Conservative and Reform, but rejected by the Orthodox.

That is simply not true. After all, most of the members of the Ne'eman Committee – five out of seven – are Orthodox. All of the members of the committee are responsible, community-minded people, who undoubtedly were in regular communication with the constituencies they represented.

In my view, the Orthodox members of the committee were probably shocked when they heard the reaction of the 10 rabbis.

The Chief Rabbinate, endorsing the committee's statement that it alone is the sole rabbinic authority on conversion matters, also accepted the call of the committee to expand their courts to handle a greater volume of conversion applications, notably by Russian and Ethiopian olim, but rejected any overture to work together with the other movements.

Yaacov Ne'eman, for his part, and this was echoed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, accepted the response of the Chief Rabbinate as a green light. As for the rabbinate's rejection of the idea of working with the other movements, Ne'eman insisted that this will happen through the Jewish Agency. The Chief Rabbinate was not asked about this at all.

The Conservative and Reform in Israel, who agreed to call off their court challenges to the status quo in exchange for a cooperative arrangement, feel that the reaction by the Chief Rabbinical Council subverts the thrust of the committee's recommendations, and at least for the present, do not feel obliged to withdraw the court challenge.

Just recently, thanks to the efforts of Ya'acov Ne'eman, committee member Alex Lubotsky and others, the committee's suggestions were endorsed by the Knesset, although less than half the Knesset members were present for the vote.

That is where the situation now stands.

Where is the Orthodox community's position on the Ne'eman Committee? That is a complicated question for various reasons, not the least of which is that the Orthodox community is not monolithic.

There are, undoubtedly, significant numbers within the Orthodox community who are uncomfortable with the committee's recommendations.

But what follows are reasons why the Orthodox community should applaud and endorse the Solomonic wisdom of the Ne'eman Committee.

The first reason is basic. The situation without Ne'eman invites disaster. Here is the scenario. If the Ne'eman initiative fails, the Conservative and Reform in Israel will proceed with their court challenge.

Based on the present composition of Israel's Supreme Court, the challenge will succeed. What will happen then? We will begin to entrench within Israel two types of legally accepted conversion. This would be the forerunner to two separate rabbinical court systems. This, in turn, would usher in an entrenched divisiveness reminiscent of the divided monarchies of Judah and Israel.

No more needs to be said to appreciate the ugly repercussions such a scenario contains for Israel's future, and ours.

That is the negative reason Orthodox Jews should endorse the recommendations. There is also a positive one: namely, that there is so much to be gained in a cooperative arrangement.

If the Ne'eman construct works in Israel, it can become a model for cooperation outside Israel.

Working together, the various streams may be able to implement a similar formula for conversions in North America. If we succeeded in this, gone would be the threat to the Jewish community that stems from having differing approaches on matters affecting Jewish status.

The choice is either to wallow in recriminations, or to proceed forward. The former leads us nowhere; the latter leads us toward a cohesive, integrated, future.

Shalom is a transcending value in Judaism. In the Sefer Haredim, we are taught that strife drives God away. Based on the phrase in Job (23:13) that God is "in one," the author posits that this differs from saying that God is One. God is "in one" means that God cannot reside in a divided community; God can only bestow the Divine Presence in a united community.

When the community is united, no iniquity can drive God away, not even idolatry. The author of Sefer Haredim is led to the unavoidable conclusion that disunity is the ultimate idolatry, since it drives God away.

Does this observation not place upon the religious community an extra responsibility to act in a manner which conduces to God remaining within us?

This has less to do with who is right and more to do with what is right.

Concurrent with Ya'acov Ne'eman's presentation of his committee's recommendations, Avraham Burg, (centre) chair of the Jewish Agency, brokered a somewhat controversial "technical" solution to the conversion problem. Burg's solution calls for the registration of all conversions for civil purposes but not for religious purposes. Seen with Burg are, from left, Rabbi Uri Regev, Reform Movement; Rabbi Ehud Bendel, Conservative Movement; Rabbi Yisrael Rosen, head of the conversion department of the Chief Rabbinate; and Rabbi Yehuda Gilad, of the office of the Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron. Knesset seeks a compromise solution

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Aency

JERUSALEM — Conservative and Reform leaders in Israel are welcoming what they called the "good intentions" of a Knesset resolution backing the proposals of a committee that tried to resolve the conversion crisis.

But they said it was up to Israel's Orthodox Chief Rabbinate to make the compromise proposal work. And they pledged to renew the battle against the Orthodox monopoly over conversions in court.

The vote last week in the Knesset, while reflecting widespread support for the efforts of the Ne'eman Committee, was largely symbolic.

Both the way the resolution played out in the Knesset and the reaction to it indicated that the long-sought compromise proposal is no closer to solving the conversion crisis in Israel than it was when it was first announced last month.

The committee, headed by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, recommended establishing an interdenominational conversion institute, while leaving the actual conversion process under the rabbinate's control.

But the Chief Rabbinate has yet to endorse the formula.

Thus, despite Knesset endorsement, the fact remains "that the Chief Rabbinate rejected the committee's recommendations," said Rabbi Ehud Bandel, president of the Masorti (Conservative) movement in Israel.

"Since the Chief Rabbinate has legal responsibility for conversions in Israel, the recommendations of the committee cannot be implemented without the Chief Rabbinate's full participation."

The Knesset took up the issue last week with a four-hour debate. In the end, 26 Knesset members voted in favor of the resolution backing the Ne'eman Committee, five voted against and 24 abstained.

Abstaining lawmakers from the opposition actually supported the resolution. But they did not vote in favor because minutes before the vote, the Netanyahu government declared that a vote for the resolution would be a vote of confidence in the policies of the government.

The government made that move as the only way to fend off a move by United Torah Judaism, a haredi party that had tried to turn the vote into a no-confidence vote, in an effort to torpedo parliamentary support of the Ne'eman compromise.

The numbers reflected the power of the Haredim to transform what would have been a clear victory for those who supported the compromise effort to a milder show of support.

Although fewer than half of the Knesset's 120 members participated, turnout was relatively high for this type of vote.

Dozens took the podium, reflecting the growing Knesset awareness of the issue's importance. Except for the haredi members, lawmakers from all sides of the house praised the compromise.

For his part, Ne'eman, who still believes his initiative is alive, said during the debate that he was pleased to see such widespread support in the Knesset.

Earlier this month, some 80 Knesset members had signed a petition backing the Ne'eman Committee.

The motion approved by the Knesset was proposed by Alex Lubotzky of the centrist Third Way Party. Lubotzky has been a driving force in compromise efforts on the conversion issue.

According to the resolution, the Knesset adopted the Ne'eman Committee's conclusions "as a single unit, and considers these to be a contribution to the unity of the Jewish people."

The reference to a "single unit" was intended to keep the rabbinate from breaking up the compromise proposal and preventing the joint conversion institute from being formed.

Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Centre, said a Jerusalem Magistrates Court was scheduled to revive a discussion on 23 cases of Reform conversions that have not been recognized by the Interior Ministry.

The Reform and Conservative movements had frozen the legal battle during the seven months that the Ne'eman Committee worked on a compromise.

The government wants to defer discussion on these cases for another two months. But Regev said the Reform movement will object, since the fate of the Ne'eman Committee's compromise was uncertain.

He said about half the cases under discussion in the court involved Israel's failure to recognize conversions performed abroad, and not just conversions in Israel.

Opinions

Focusing on the wrong target

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

On March 1, 1991, Iraq accepted the terms of the ceasefire agreement offered by the U.S.-led coalition, and Israelis were finally able to remove the tape from the sealed rooms and put away their gas masks.

U.S. president George Bush stopped the war before the destruction of the Iraqi army and the removal of Saddam Hussein, but with the expectation that after the punishment that had been inflicted, Saddam's days were numbered. In the belief that the Iraqis would no longer threaten any of their neighbors, including Israel, the United States and the world turned their attention to other issues.

In this environment, the Bush administration pressed a skeptical Israeli government, led by Yitzhak Shamir, to agree to participation in the international Middle East peace conference in Madrid. This marked the beginning of the process that led to the Oslo accords, the creation of the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli withdrawals. However, it did not lead to Middle East peace or to an end to terrorism and threat of war.

For the past seven years, most of the attention and energies of the diplomats and statesmen dealing with the Middle East have been focused on the Arab-Israeli negotiations. The continued military threats from not only Iraq, but also Syria and Iran, have been either ignored or considered of marginal importance. Recently, the world has focused obsessively on the question of Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank areas of Judea and Samaria, as if this was the only important issue facing the Middle East.

The Israeli government also allowed itself to be diverted from dealing with the major threats to national security. One year ago, the Netanyahu government reduced the budget for gas masks; as a result, many Israelis, as well as tourists and students, had to scramble to get protective equipment.

Yet, from the day the U.S. troops left Iraq and Kuwait, it was clear that Saddam Hussein had no intention of implementing the ceasefire agreement. Almost immediately, Iraq failed to provide the UN with a complete accounting of programs involving weapons of mass destruction, and blocked the destruction of all related materials and facilities under the supervision of the UN special commission. Saddam was determined to maintain as many of his chemical, biological and nuclear weapons as possible and to prepare them for another day.

After the major operation mounted during the 1991 Gulf War, the Americans and their allies in the international coalition were far from eager to admit that they had left before the job was finished. It was much easier for officials in Washington, Ottawa and the capitals of Europe to send delegations to Israel to press for concessions to Arafat and the Palestinians. Countless hours, days and months were spent searching for formulas to bridge the gap between Israel and the Palestinians.

When Israelis voiced concern regarding the impact of these proposals on their security, the foreign diplomats and officials dismissed these fears or naively argued that by making the concessions to the Palestinians, the longer-range threats would ultimately disappear.

However, seven years later, we are back preparing our sealed rooms and gas masks – deja-vu all over again. In fact, the dangers may have increased, as Iraq has had seven years to develop its arsenal of biological weapons.

Compared to 1991, Saddam may have a smaller incentive and greater difficulty attacking Israel with Scud missiles, but given a little more time and some more resources, Iraq will be able to restore this capability as well.

In addition, it seems that despite the 1993 Oslo agreement and the creation of the Palestinian Authority, the Palestinians have not changed their views.

Pro-Saddam demonstrations are taking place throughout the autonomous areas.

If the past is a guide, after the current crisis, the diplomats and political leaders around the world will again turn to the Palestinian negotiations. They will again demand that Israel make more concessions and take even greater security risks. They must be reminded forcefully and continuously that Israeli policy is not the cause of violence and instability, but now, as in the past, it is a response to the threats in the region. The removal of these threats, not only from Iraq, but also from Iran, Syria and other sources, should be the primary focus of the world's diplomats and peace-makers.

Are we having fun yet?

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Are we having fun yet? Have we figured out how and what to celebrate about Israel's 50th anniversary? In fact, does anybody here really care? Not really. Rather, make that an unequivocal no to all of the above.

Israel is suffering an acute bout of middle age birthday blues. It wasn't supposed to be like this and – with so much to truly celebrate – it shouldn't be like this. In 1996, the government began casting its eye on the jubilee anniversary, excited at the prospect of such a positive event the whole country could surely rally around – and associate with those in power. After all, how could a people who had endured unparalleled adversity not welcome the chance to celebrate and showcase the first half-century of Jewish sovereignty?

Plans included a military parade, an Israel Philharmonic concert on Masada, a symposium of Jewish Nobel Prize winners in Jerusalem, a fashion salute to Israel by the world's leading designers, an "achievements exhibition," and a Miss Universe pageant in Eilat. This was going to be one party not to miss.

It was announced that festivities would kick off on Rosh Hashanah last September. That came and went with nothing to show except a growing political feud over plans for the celebrations. The launch was pushed off to December with a festive ceremony planned for the president's official residence in Jerusalem. But that, too, came to naught when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu failed to convince President Ezer Weizman to let his ceremonial lighting of the first Chanukah candle be considered the official kickoff of jubilee events. Red-faced organizers then said the celebrations would be inaugurated in February on Tu b'Shvat, the national holiday of trees.

All the while, the organizing of events was degenerating into an embarrassing fiasco. Three successive chairpeople of the official planning committee resigned amid bitter recrimination and bureaucratic infighting.

The cabinet minister overseeing the whole production quit, blaming the Prime Minister's Office for much of the disarray. The dispute deepened as senior officials traded insults and accusations of corruption and other skullduggery. Several members of the Knesset State Control Committee, appalled by the gigantic balagan (mess), said the celebrations should be called off. It seemed a hex had been put on the jubilee preparations, turning them into a farce. Few people were amused.

Indeed, few people seemed in the mood to celebrate, even without the many snafus. Rising unemployment, a chronically stalled peace process and a growing rift between secular and religious people hardly contributed to a party spirit.

Finally last month, much to the collective yawn of the nation, Netanyahu and Weizman travelled to the southern town of Kiryat Gat for the long postponed official launching of Israel's 50th anniversary. True to the form of the problem-plagued jubilee committee, the ceremony generated more negative publicity than positive.

Several relatives of fallen soldiers had been invited to the event, only to find their reserved seats taken by local municipal workers who refused to budge. Some of the bereaved left in tears just as Netanyahu began his address. Opposition Knesset members voiced anger at not being invited, while Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert said he was shocked the capital didn't host the ceremony. No reason was given for the choice of Kiryat Gat, most recently in the news for being home to the country's only gas mask factory.

Organizers are now engaged in a furious race against the clock to salvage the celebrations before it's too late. As it is, budgets have been slashed and many of the grand events originally planned for the coming months have been shelved or scaled down.

It won't be the party it could have been, but Israelis needn't feel so bad about the jubilee mess. Other countries have also seen their best laid plans for benchmark celebrations come unglued amid chaos and controversy.

While living in France in 1989, I remember a similar dispute erupted over the Mitterrand government's mishandling of preparations for the 200th anniversary of the French Revolution. A few months before the big day, on the cover of Paris Passion, the city magazine I was editing at the time, the headline read "The Botching of the Bicentennial." In the end, organizers pulled out the stops, got their act together and on Bastille Day staged festivities enjoyed by millions.

With Independence Day less than two months away, I hope jubilee organizers can pull off a similar feat and show people a good time on April 30. Far bigger miracles have occurred here before. On the nation's 50th birthday, Israelis deserve nothing less.

The Polish enigma

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There are few books I have enjoyed as thoroughly as the little volume called Shtetl by Eva Hoffman. It is extraordinarily well written, crystal clear and exhaustively researched. The sub-title is "The life and death of a small town and the world of Polish Jews." Rabbi Bernard Baskin reviewed it in an earlier edition of The CJN, and I would like to add some personal observations.

Hoffman brings us the reality of 500 years of Polish life – from its beginnings to its glory days of Jewish culture and its final destruction by the Nazis. The 250 pages of this small book are worth your while, though some of her implications and conclusions have been contested, especially about Polish participation in the Shoah.

Hoffman chooses an unusual way of presenting such an ambitious overview: She concentrates on a little town near the Russian border, with forays into larger history. She examines the nature of the shtetl community. What was its real content, its daily life, its pleasures and its downsides? Does the shtetl deserve to be recalled today with the affection which usually is bestowed upon it?

Hoffman's answer is yes and no. The shtetl she describes was warm and intimate; everybody knew everyone else; and every Jew knew precisely of his or her identity, and the economic and social possibilities this betokened. But the shtetl was also narrow and confining, with few of the world's larger issues penetrating its consciousness.

Most fascinating to me, was Hoffman's constant reference to the relationship between Poles and Jews – living together for centuries, yet not knowing each other beyond the minimum provided by daily contact. Wary of each other, but also relying on one another, they were ultimately separated by increasing nationalism and anti-Semitism. The Nazis did the rest.

Much of the content of the book relies on a running memoir that was kept by the Jewish community and miraculously survived the Holocaust. Called the Yizkor Book, it recorded the ongoing life of the shtetl, naming names, vividly picturing events and leaving the reader with a sense of immediacy rarely found in history.

Here is just one brief account of Hoffman's analysis of Polish-Jewish relationships:

"The almost complete absence of Poles from its account of the shtetl's life probably represents a kind of reality: the reality of spiritual, if not practical, isolation. Jews and Poles of the town lived side by side, but in a state of considerable ignorance of one another. At the market, in the inn, in the shops, there was mingling, and there must have been acquaintanceships, casual friendships. But in many ways that mattered, the two communities were impenetrable. They did not go into each other's houses or places of worship; they knew little of each other's thinking or concerns.

"Still, they saw each other every day. How, one wonders, did they appear to each other at this daily distance?"

My previous knowledge of Poland was based on the scholarly writings of Simon Dubnow; Hoffman brings it back to life in a way that I found most engaging, instructive and memorable.

The Kirshner File

Israel working to free Jonathan Pollard

Jonathan Jay Pollard languishes in an American prison, a self-confessed spy.

Pollard and his second wife, Esther Zeitz, a Toronto teacher, claim that Israel and the American Jewish community have not done enough to secure his release. "They promise and do nothing," Zeitz has charged. But the accusation is disingenuous. In the past few years, Israeli and U.S. Jewish leaders have in fact exerted considerable efforts on his behalf.

By Sheldon Kirshner

A civilian intelligence analyst in the employ of the U.S. Navy before his arrest in 1985 outside the Israeli Embassy, Pollard gave Israel reams of classified documents pertaining to the military capabilities of Arab states, including Iraq. Rightly or wrongly, he was convinced that the United States was concealing vital strategic information from Israel.

In 1986, as part of a plea bargain with the U.S. government, Pollard pleaded guilty to espionage and agreed to forgo his constitutional right to a trial in return for a promise that prosecutors would not press for a life sentence. But after receiving a memorandum from then U.S. secretary of defence Caspar Weinberger claiming that Pollard had inflicted inestimable harm to American security, a judge sentenced him to life imprisonment.

Initially, Israel abandoned Pollard to his fate, claiming that he had been a "rogue" agent whose activities had not been officially sanctioned. But since then, while not publicly admitting that Pollard was indeed in Israel's pay, every Israeli prime minister from Yitzhak Shamir to Benjamin Netanyahu has repeatedly asked for his freedom.

In the early 1990s, two members of the Knesset, as well as a representative of Israel's consulate in Atlanta, Ga., visited Pollard in prison at the Federal Correctional Institute in Butner, N.C.

Two years ago, in a remarkable gesture, Israel granted him citizenship. Last year, Immigration Minister Yuli Edelstein and Communication Minister Limor Livnat became the first Israeli cabinet ministers to visit Pollard. Livnat brought him letters of support from Netanyahu and two other ministers. In December, the Knesset formally issued an appeal for a pardon.

Meanwhile, American Jewish organizations have gradually embraced Pollard's cause. Ambivalent at first about the justice of his case, they now rally around him.

In 1995, the head of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, Lester Pollack, visited him. And two months ago, the conference launched a concerted letter-writing campaign to free Pollard on humanitarian grounds.

After visiting him late last year, the immediate past president of the Union of Hebrew Congregations, Rabbi Alexander Schindler, and the secretary general of the World Jewish Congress, Israel Singer, called for the commutation of his life sentence.

President Bill Clinton, a friend of Israel, rejected clemency pleas in March 1994 and again in July 1996, citing the enormity of his crime, his lack of remorse and the damage he caused to U.S. interests. Former president George Bush had previously refused to commute Pollard's sentence.

Seven years in solitary confinement

The rationale for freeing Pollard – who has spent seven of 13 years in solitary confinement and who has variously described himself as "a front-line soldier deep in enemy territory" and as a trapped "ghetto fighter" – is that the punishment does not fit the crime.

Pollard's sympathizers argue that he has expressed remorse and publicly apologized for his crime, and that he has been punished far more severely than any other American who has spied for a U.S. ally. As examples, they cite the 1996 cases of Robert Kim and Michael Schwartz. Kim was sentenced to 10 years (with eligibility for parole) for selling secret intelligence documents to South Korea, while Schwartz was completely let off for turning over similar documents to Saudi Arabia.

By all accounts, an informal alliance of officials, both active and retired, in the Pentagon and the intelligence community oppose leniency for Pollard, whom they consider a traitor. David Biale, in a piece in the magazine Tikkun, claims that some of his harshest critics, such as Sumner Shapiro, the former chief of naval intelligence, are Jews. They are reportedly outraged by Pollard's crime because of the shadow it casts over their own integrity. As Biale puts it, "Pollard was their worst paranoid nightmare come true, something that only an anti-Semite could invent: an American Jew in the defence establishment more loyal to Israel than to the United States."

Although Pollard's hopes of being freed any time soon have dimmed, he continues to fight. Recently, he petitioned the Israeli Supreme Court to force Israel to acknowledge him as its agent. Pollard's lawyer, Larry Dub, believes that such an acknowledgement could clear the way for his eventual release. Dub has also floated a proposal under which he would be released in exchange for a Russian scientist in the United States convicted of espionage.

With no immediate prospect of gaining his freedom, Pollard, suffering from arthritis and developing glaucoma, has grown increasingly bitter. Last October, in a far-fetched analogy, he compared his plight with that of Israel's quick response in obtaining the release of two Mossad agents caught red-handed trying to assassinate a Hamas leader in Amman, Jordan. This, he claimed, was proof of Israel's perfidy. But Pollard is wrong. By word and deed, Israel has shown it is working to set him free.

Portrait of Iraq

During the latest crisis over Iraq's non-compliance with UN weapons inspections, the self-satisfied figure of Saddam Hussein loomed large in the West.

In Iraq, however, he needs no introduction. There, in the "republic of fear," he is portrayed as an avuncular father figure of the nation, according to Paul William Roberts, a Toronto writer who has visited Iraq three times since 1990.

In The Demonic Comedy (Stoddart), a lively, irreverent, stylistically eccentric account of a country under siege, Roberts describes contemporary Iraq before and after the 1991 Gulf War.

On his first trip to Iraq in early 1990, he literally comes face to face with Saddam, whose portrait is ubiquitously emblazoned on walls, and factories. Schools, cafes, sports arenas, hospitals and even Baghdad's airport are named in his honor. The cult of the personality reigns supreme in Iraq.

Roberts, given the rare opportunity of interviewing Saddam, depicts him as a cold, aloof individual whose remoteness cannot be penetrated. "I looked back at the eyes and realized what was most unnerving about them was that there was nobody behind them," he writes.

Though reluctant to discuss politics, Saddam is more forthcoming with respect to his favorite film. Not surprisingly, it is The Godfather, the saga of a Mafia family.

At the height of the Gulf War, Roberts sneaks into Iraq with the help of smugglers, stumbles upon Scud missile launchers, observes wholesale devastation and is arrested on the outskirts of Baghdad.

Returning yet again in 1995, he discovers that Baghdad is deserted, bleak, forlorn and dark, but not crushed.

Starkly realistic, The Demonic Comedy spares no one but the long-suffering people of Iraq.

Agunah vigil set for March 10

TORONTO — The fifth annual community vigil for agunot – women denied a Jewish divorce – will take place Tuesday March 10 at 7:30 p.m. with the Ontario premiere of the documentary Untying the Bonds...Jewish Divorce.

Produced by the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, the documentary was filmed in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, and features three women who have stepped forward to share their experience with Jewish divorce.

Project chair Marilyn Bicher says the film illustrates how rabbis, community organizations and women's groups have become allied "toward the release of agunot from their recalcitrant husbands."

In the film, Rabbis Reuben Poupko and Gavriel Newman explain how rabbis convince men whose marriages are virtually over, to give their wives a get.

The coalition says the documentary should be of special interest to professionals in social work, law, Jewish education and to rabbis. It's meant as a learning guide on Jewish divorce.

"It is so important that Jewish men and women who are about to divorce, or are going through a divorce, should have the right information regarding civil and Jewish divorce," says Norman Joseph, founding president of the International Coalition of Agunah Rights. "It is essential that Canadian federal legislation be used appropriately."

The vigil will take place at the Borochov Centre (272 Codsell Ave.)

For information, call the Jewish Women's Federation, 635-2883, ext. 174, or Na'amat Canada, 636-5425.

German posting proved interesting

Diplomatically Speaking

By JEHUDI KINAR

In my last column, I described my stint in the Netherlands. This time I would like to describe my stay in Germany. Germany is still the only country to which a staff member of our Ministry of Foreign Affairs can refuse to be posted for reasons of conscience.

Because I was born in the Netherlands during World War II, I had, as a survivor, every right to refuse an appointment to Germany.

When the position of minister-counsellor for Press, Information and Press Affairs at our embassy in Bonn was suggested to me, I asked for a few days of respite.

I knew that a decision to accept this post would be incomprehensible to some of my relatives and friends, especially as for years, my family had made enormous detours across Belgium, Luxemburg and France in order to get to Switzerland, instead of taking the most direct and shortest route through Germany. We "of course" would not drive a German-made car or use any German-made electrical appliances.

But when the date of decision-making came, I decided to accept the appointment. Since my parents spoke German at home, it had become my second mother-tongue. The number of German-speakers at the ministry was very limited and I realized that serving in Germany was like going to the army – if I refused to do the job, it would mean someone else would have to serve in my place.

People often ask me whether I "liked" being in Germany. It was certainly not a question of liking, but I think for an Israeli diplomat to serve in Germany is one of our most interesting postings. It is certainly the most important one in Europe.

From the beginning, I had a profound distrust of Germans above a certain age group. I would ask myself, "Where was he during the war and what did he do?" My experience with the younger generation, however, was very positive. They questioned their parents and especially their grandparents and wanted to know what they had done during the war.

My wife and I made many good and lasting friendships in Germany with people from all walks of life. They showed their friendship, for example, in January 1991 during the Gulf War, when they phoned us regularly just to hear our voices and to know how we were.

Now that there is again talk of a war with Iraq, I am reminded also of what happened in 1990 after the invasion of Kuwait: the Christian groups continued with their organized visits to Israel, while many of the Jewish groups cancelled theirs. I had difficulty understanding this phenomenon.

My wife, who is a sabra (of German background) was born after World War II. She was not as apprehensive as I was about living in Germany, but once she had arrived, she was immediately confronted by prejudices. While being shown around by a colleague in Bonn to help her get accustomed to the shopping areas, a saleslady who had heard them speaking Hebrew asked what language it was. Once told, the saleslady reacted, stammering, "But they always said...but you look so normal." It took my wife some time to overcome this.

I myself also had an unforgettable experience in Germany. In 1983, I officiated at the opening of an Israel Week in the City Hall of Laupheim (not far from Ulm, where Einstein was born). There, a very distinguished-looking gentleman in the crowd asked permission to say a few words. He mentioned that it was for him the first time that he had met an Israeli and that he had been an S.S. officer during the war. He wanted – on the spot – to apologize to the Jewish people and to ask me for forgiveness.

He stretched his hand out to me and I was in a very awkward situation, as I certainly could not forgive him on behalf of others, but could not refuse to shake his hand. (In 1993, I could so well understand Yitzhak Rabin's facial expressions while he shook Arafat's hand.)

Did I like it in Germany? No, but I had the satisfaction of representing the State of Israel, which according to all the Nazi theories, should not have existed, and as a survivor, to be the proof that Nazi Germany had failed.

Jewish Life

Formalities' dangers

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With the onset of Adar, we again prepare for the celebrations of Purim.

The story itself depicts a Jewish community living in exile. They must contend with life in a foreign country that includes both political and social realities.

The villain of the story is the royal parliamentarian Haman, who plots to eradicate the Jews in the empire. The conflict between Haman and the Jews seems to begin with Mordecai's refusal to bow to Haman in the streets of the city. The rabbis discuss Mordecai's behavior and conclude that Haman was wearing an idol and therefore Mordecai could not bow to him. The text does not allude to the issue of idolatry and therefore one needs to ask why did Mordecai not bow down to Haman?

In fact, the entire Jewish people are put in jeopardy as a result of Mordecai's action, which causes one to search for a truly compelling reason for it.

Haman reacts to Mordecai's effrontery by approaching the king with the timeless racist proclamation of all bigots: there are people among us who are different. The king accepts Haman's paranoid portrayal and agrees to a war against the Jews.

The text clearly portrays Haman as a political figure of high ranking and his biased politics are not hidden from view. In fact, a midrashic text states: "Haman came to inquire after Mordecai's welfare. Mordecai said to him, 'There is no peace [extended to] the wicked' and Haman became incensed." According to this midrash, Mordecai was not relating to Haman's pagan beliefs but rather to his personhood.

It was clear to Mordecai that Haman was evil and he therefore refused to bow down.

Mordecai raises the question of whether one should give honor to a person, even a politician, as a matter of etiquette. When a Canadian lawyer enters the Supreme Court, it is customary to bow. However, what if one of the judges is overtly racist and allows these racist views to dictate judicial findings? Should the lawyer still bow? Mordecai's behavior forces us to ask whether we can separate the office from the person and his answer is a resounding no.

The midrash connecting Haman with idolatry certainly explains the religious reason for Mordecai's behavior. However, the more subtle point of the text cannot be dismissed. There are certain values and ethics one expects from people in power and when these morals are lacking, one should not peacefully comply with formalities that are due the position, devoid of its occupant.

I once met a woman who proudly told me her mother had presented a bouquet of flowers to Hitler. When she saw I was aghast, she said that of course she did not agree with his politics, but he was still the head of a country and therefore her mother was privileged.

Across all these centuries of time I stand proud that a leader of my people understood the danger of thoughtless formalities.

A number of Purim sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at kids' Purim sites on the Internet. Today, more on the happiest holiday in the calendar.

If you want to brush up on Megillat Esther (and if your Web browser can handle Hebrew), you can find the original at [http://snunit.huji.ac.il/snunit/kodesh/bible/mastr.html]. Or sit back and listen to "Cantor Rabinovitz" conduct a Virtual Megillah Reading at 613.org [http://www.613.org/purim.html]. A traditional English translation of Megillat Esther can be found at Purim Play Today [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/purim/mocknews/]. Each chapter is given headline as if it were published in a modern tabloid newspaper: "King Ahasuerus to remarry; future queen, a commoner, beats out long line of candidates," or "Two royal chamberlains caught in murder/espionage conspiracy; captured by security specialist Mordecai, a former Israeli agent" and "The gang's all here – Haman and sons receive lift."

One of the well-known traditions of the holiday is the obligation to drink until you can no longer distinguish between "Cursed is Haman" and "Blessed is Mordecai." In Drink is the Link, Rabbi Mendel Weinbach looks at the practical application of the mitzvah and the reasons behind it [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/purim/drnklink.htm]. Eli Birnbaum also looks at some of the reasons but also gives a recipe for Israeli Orange Brandy [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/drink.htm].

I recommend taking a look at Seven Silly and Serious Suggestions for a Wild and Meaningful Purim [http://www.jewishfamily.com/holidays/danan.htm]. On the same page, you'll also find a couple of links to some Purim-related discussion areas. The first asks for your special Purim traditions. The other asks how you would answer a child who asks: "Will someone like Haman try to hurt me and other Jews?" How would you respond?

If you still want more about Purim, then stop at these sites. Holidays with a Twist [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/holidays.htm#purim] has a fascinating article on Other Purims, about Jewish communities throughout history that were saved from almost certain destruction. For more Purim links, see Hareshima [http://www.hareshima.com/purim.htm], Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx127.htm] and the Jewish Communications Network [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/purim/index.htm].

Two years ago, I lamented in this column that although I was able to find some on-line recipes for prune or jam hamantashen, I could find none for poppy seed. Boy have things changed! Poppy seed lovers can now find many recipes on the Internet, such as the ones at the Jewish Food Recipe Archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/hamindex.htm].

Looking for hamantashen that are bit more adventurous? Cream cheese hamantashen sound interesting [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/hamacrch.htm]. I suppose I could even stomach Hamantashen with Marshmallows [http://www.shamash.org/jrf/tbipa/hol/recipe.html]. But I'm still not ready for a mishloach manot basket full of, oy, beef-filled hamantashen sitting on my doorstep! [http://dinnercoop.cs.cmu.edu/dinnercoop/Recipes/jody/FlayshigeHamantashen.html]

Chag samayach!

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI CHANANYA BERZON

Don't ever forget

On the Shabbat preceding Purim, we read from two Torah scrolls.

From the first, we read the weekly sequence, T'tzaveh. From the second, we read the special portion of Zachor – Remember Amalek. Haman, the villain of Purim, shared a common goal with his ancestor Amalek – the annihilation of the Jews.

The Torah advises us to remember numerous events. At the conclusion of the morning services, various siddurim list all the instances where the Torah tells us to remember. However, only remembering the treachery of Amalek is a mitzvah. Why? What is unique about this specific "Zachor"?

Another aspect of Zachor germane to the mitzvah is a command to destroy Amalek and his descendants. Not only must we remember the evil they attempted to perpetrate against the Jews, but we must also destroy them. How can the Almighty catapult the Jews into the role of destroyers of an entire nation?

We who espouse the attributes of caring, love and compassion are enjoined to kill! Can this be? Evidently the mandate to obliterate Amalek has a timeless message for us. The Jewish people have an enormous responsibility that involves much more than caring for the sick and the poor and helping the deprived and the aged.

Everyone has a responsibility to do good, but there is an added dimension placed upon our shoulders. We have to create and sustain a world where acts of kindness become the lifestyle and the norm of everyone: Olam chesed yibaneh. We have to nurture a universe of concern and benevolence. Any sign or vestige that rejects this must be suppressed. We are obliged to guarantee that everyone does good, and those who repudiate this obligation must be broken.

That was the sin of Amalek and Haman. The very nature of Amalek's character as embodied in the attempt to destroy the Jewish people was the antithesis of kindness. The rationale was that the Jews leaving Egypt were tired and weak. They would be parasites and bloodsuckers on the backs of the nations of the world. It was therefore imperative to do a service for the world by annihilating the Jews.

Haman had a similar thought. His theory was that the Jews were spread throughout the world. Their religion was different from that of others and they only caused problems and enmity. The world would be better without them. In today's parlance, we refer to it as ethnic cleansing.

How can a world listen to Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz portray his country as a lover of peace, brazenly claiming, "The embargo causes malnutrition and suffering," while the country manufactures chemicals that perhaps will destroy mankind? How can we listen to the audacious Swiss government talk about Jewish forced labor during the Nazi regime as something good that was done for the Jews? "We let some of them go home in the evenings. We even let some attend university part time."

The mitzvah to remember Amalek painfully thrusts us into the role of being the conscience of the world, the town crier, shouting, "Don't forget! Never again! Destroy those inhumans who poison our bodies and minds!" How tormenting and repugnant it is. How much it goes against our grain. It behooves the Jew to neither forget nor sanction anyone else to forgive. Good men might attempt to sit idly by. We don't have that luxury. The burden to be the watchdog of the world is placed upon our shoulders. We cannot just sit by and watch evil flourish. We have to destroy the contagious venom before it pervades the entire world.

Zachor – remember. Don't ever forget!

Separating shul and state

By RABBI REUBEN POUPKO

That the core proposals of the Ne'eman Committee have been rejected by Israel's chief rabbis should come as no surprise.

Mainstream Orthodoxy is committed to denying any explicit or implicit recognition to movements which, by an Orthodox measuring stick, have failed to heed halachic and theological imperatives. The power to deny that recognition is absent in the Diaspora, but it is wielded in Israel with the simple justification that, when possible, anything regarded as illegitimate must be labelled as such.

In response to plaintive pleas for pluralism, the Orthodox reply that to import the diversity of Diaspora Jewry to Israel is to guarantee, at the very least, confusion on the basic question of identity of Israeli Jews. In the worst case scenario, it would mean the transplantation of the demographics of Diaspora Jewish life along with its religious movements. (Admittedly, however, it is difficult to imagine wholesale intermarriage in Israel.)

The impact of this policy is clear. It further distances Diaspora Jewry from Israel in a way that can have profound implications for Israel's standing in Washington. It leaves many Jews disenchanted with what is often their only connection to Jewish life, the State of Israel. In addition, it strengthens the painful perception that Israel is the cause of disunity among Diaspora Jews.

The reaction of the Conservative and Reform leadership has likewise been disturbing. The singular focus on pluralism has blinded too many to the long-term interests of the Jewish people.

Instead of presenting the issues in their proper context and imploring their communities to challenge offending policies while at the same time stressing solidarity with Israel, too many Reform and Conservative rabbis have openly encouraged Jews to redirect charity from the communal pipeline to partisan religious institutions.

They have also left unchallenged the distortions of the Orthodox position: No Orthodox rabbi or institution has questioned the "Jewishness" of any born Jew. Yet the Conservative and Reform campaign relentlessly implies otherwise. Lapel pins urging Israel not to write off four million Jews are a deliberate distortion that exacerbates the divisiveness in Jewish life and is sadly blind to the impact of its slogans. (When 60 percent of American Jewry is completely unaffiliated, the number four million is a gross exaggeration, as is the claim of the Reform and Conservative that they represent 80 percent of American Jewry.)

The Conservative and Reform movements are in the enviable position of possessing a winning hand. The cultural realities of modern life condemn the Orthodox stance, from the start, as a public relations disaster.

Overwhelmingly, Diaspora Jews view religion as a search for meaning and identity, and therefore, nearly anything with even a scintilla of a Jewish link is beyond criticism.

Orthodoxy believes in something that, to most modern ears, is offensive. Religion, for the Orthodox, may provide meaning and sense of belonging, but first and foremost, it is the search for absolute truth. The divide is unbridgeable.

There is but one solution that can begin to bring the Jewish people back together again. Instead of equal recognition for all streams of Judaism in Israel, we ought to be advocating an equality of non-recognition for all religious movements, in matters of personal status.

It is imperative that this issue, which is fundamentally unresolvable, be eliminated from our agenda by removing all government involvement in religious marriage, divorce and conversion in Israel. For the sake of Zionism, Jewish unity and Jewish destiny, a little separation between synagogue and state can go a long way.

Adult study groups tackle Judaic topics

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Today, people are looking for answers and ways to connect to the meaningful parts of their lives – affluence doesn't give answers, says Chana Sargon, an independent Jewish educator specializing in the study of biblical events and personalities.

Throughout the community, adult study groups are forming in unprecedented numbers to study a broad range of Judaic topics. To understand this phenomenon, The CJN spoke to three independent educators, Sargon, Dr. Elliott Malamet and Selma Sage, to examine people's increasing desire to study Jewish texts.

Sage, a lecturer and leadership trainer, teaches Jewish history with an emphasis on women's role in Judaism.

"I tell my students there is nothing that happens in life that doesn't happen in Tanach – it happens in the text." She says she puts the biblical texts into their everyday lives.

"The classes just form themselves – usually someone in a class forms another class with peers or friends," she says. Sage teaches more than 100 women in a variety of classes, as well as couples.

"Men come from a different perspective. Women think that their husbands and brothers know more than they do, but that is not the reality."

A graduate in classical archeology and moral development and moral philosophy, Sage, who has lectured throughout Canada, the United States and Israel, says she began teaching adults because "I wanted to share my love of the biblical characters."

Her first adult classes were formed with her students' parents, who wanted to learn what they had not learned as children.

"My greatest joy is to share the inspiration of the Torah," she says. Some students prefer studying the themes in the Tanach, while others choose to study line by line. Some devise their own topics, such as the relationship between art and Torah.

Malamet, formerly a professor of English literature and Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto and Queen's University in Kingston, is now involved full time in Jewish education in Toronto.

Well known to many groups for his charismatic teaching, Malamet leads an alternative Shabbat prayer service at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue called Pray and Learn, which is designed to teach participants about all aspects of prayer and respond to their questions and frustrations about Judaism. His services, which are growing in popularity, include observant to totally unaffiliated Jews.

Chana Sargon

Selma Sage

He lectures to study groups and he recently released an audio tape project entitled, The Spirit of Judaism. He says that the project focuses on the questions and concerns of today's Jews, who want to understand how Judaism can be meaningful in their lives.

The Power of Prayer sessions, he says, can best be described as an interactive spiritual self-help program, with suggestions and exercises on defining and working towards a meaningful existence. He adds that the goal of the series is not to simply give information about prayer – it is to bring you to prayer.

Sargon, who grew up in Israel where she obtained her teaching certification, received a teaching degree from the Jewish Teacher's Seminary in Toronto. She is well known for her study groups and lectures on the Bible. Her specialty is making the study of biblical events and personalities relevant to modern day life.

"Women are reaching out to serious texts and the outcome is more involvement in the community," says Sargon. "Their studies affect their lives – family, community – and they gain a better understanding of the values of our traditions."

She believes that we must educate children and parents at the same time so they can share our heritage. It is while teaching children that parents become interested in Judaic studies, she says.

A mother asked her to organize a group of adults in order to share study of the Torah with her children. This led to other groups, leadership courses and classes of diverse people – some studying for the first time.

Many of her students, she says, go on to study in depth. They develop the skills to learn, to question, to make interpretations; and the study has relevance to their lives – socially, politically and spiritually.

Using Sarah as an example of a woman of then and today, Sargon adds, "Today, we can look at our reality and find in the text perceptions which lead to a better understanding of coping with our conflicts as individuals and as a collective people."

It is the enthusiasm and love of Judaic studies shown by Sargon, Malamet, Sage and numerous other teachers, and their ability to bring relevance and meaning to Judaism's texts, that has led to the growth of adult Jewish studies here.

Teen envoys dispel myths on Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Alon Linial (left) and Sivan Pardo give pointers on Israel to a grade 10 class at Oakwood Collegiate last week.

TORONTO — Instead of the peace process, Palestinians, and the continuing tumult over conversion, two young Israeli ambassadors led their Canadian counterparts on a refreshing journey through youth employment, the Israeli club scene, and MTV.

Sivan Pardo and Alon Linial, both 16, are in Canada until mid-March to speak to high school students about Israel, and to dispel misconceptions about the Jewish state.

The teens are part of an annual Israeli foreign ministry program that sends over 100 young people to all parts of the world to discuss Israel with their mainly non-Jewish contemporaries.

According to the Israeli consulate, the purpose of the program is to establish a dialogue and foster better understanding between Canadian and Israeli teens.

Pardo and Linial broke the ice with students at a grade 10 history class at Oakwood Collegiate last week by writing the English names of some of the Canadians in Hebrew on the blackboard.

They then established an instant rapport by revealing that after school, Israeli teens tend to do the same thing as Canadians: some homework, some TV, and plenty of gabbing on the phone with friends.

The Toronto teens giggled when the Israelis revealed their favorite TV shows: Friends, Seinfeld and The Simpsons.

Israel is "a country of many contradictions," said Linial, a high school student in Kfar Saba, majoring in physics, math and Arabic. People can ski in the north one day, and swim in the warm Mediterranean the next, he noted.

The Oakwood Collegiate students were struck by Israel's smallness when a map was passed around showing the country is just 1.5 times the size of Lake Ontario, and can be traversed, north to south, in just nine hours by car.

"I know we make a lot of noise in the world, but we are small," said Pardo, a student in Tel Aviv, specializing in theatre and literature.

Things turned a bit more serious when the Israeli teens talked about compulsory army service – three years for boys and two for girls.

They also touched on the Holocaust and all of Israel's wars, including Iraq's 1991 bombings of Tel Aviv. To these kids, even the Gulf War is ancient history: they were just eight at the time.

But the Canadians do seem to recall Israel's peace agreements with the Palestinians and Jordan.

Following an upbeat, hip movie about Israel aimed at North American youth, questions come from the multicultural, multilingual class at Oakwood Collegiate.

But they're mainly about what kind of music Israeli kids listen to (hard rock); what time clubs close (later than in Ontario); movies (Titanic, Sphere); the legal drinking age (18); and youth employment (not bad, for the moment).

As Pardo told The CJN later: "They're more interested in youth than in war."

Escorted by officials from Israel's Toronto consulate, Pardo and Linial visited several high schools in and around Toronto, and are slated to travel to Winnipeg, Calgary, Saskatoon (for the first time) and Vancouver.

Wake Up Tour designed to counteract student passivity

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The catch-words are as snappy as Madison Avenue. Jewish joy. Jewish cool. A "wake-up" call.

But despite the snap, crackle and pop, there's a real seriousness of purpose behind a new movement called the Wake Up Tour being spearheaded by two Montreal students as a way to counteract widespread Jewish student passivity on campuses and to reignite the excitement and joy in simply being Jewish.

The project, essentially a tour of North American campuses combining music concerts and activist activity, is also drawing a level of attention they didn't expect.

Montreal McGill students Justin Korda and Sigmund Shore didn't know what was in store last May at Hebrew University, when they first hit upon the idea of organizing an all student-run tour.

The idea, Korda and Shore, both 19, said in an interview, is that Jewish students of all observance levels should be revelling in the simple joy, excitement, and dynamism of being Jewish "for themselves," instead of basing their Jewish identities on something they inherited from their parents or grandparents.

The movement is also trying to get Jewish students to shift their priorities, to reignite the spirit of Jewish activism that peaked during the 1960s and 1970s, but seems to have dwindled into Jewish student boredom and passivity on campuses.

"Incredibly, anti-Semitism has been the most powerful incentive for students to reaffirm their Jewish identity," Shore wrote in publicity for the tour. "[But] they are mobilized when it comes to reaction, not action.

"When do Jewish students come together to express their Jewish pride, their Jewish joy and their Jewish funk?"

"We're trying to create an atmosphere in North America where being proud of your Jewish heritage is cool," Korda said. "It was too good an idea to put aside."

It was that basic concept, along with loads of supportive e-mail that came their way and interest expressed from over 40 North American campuses, that led Korda and Shore to get the gears in motion for the Wake Up tour.

The tour got off to a rousing start when it won over many at the recent General Assembly in Indianapolis.

But even before then, the tour had already won the strong backing of such notables as World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman, who provided the tour with seed money after meeting with Korda and Shore last year in Israel, and Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel.

One of the main attractions of the tour – which will take place March 11 to 13 in Montreal, March 26 in Toronto, and at U.S. campuses – will be the popular Israeli musical group, Facing East (also known as the Moshav Band), which has literally struck a chord with large numbers of overseas Jewish students in Israel.

In Korda's and Shore's minds, the band, which mixes the inspirational Jewish music of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach with contemporary rock fare, captures perfectly the senses of joy, cool and pride Jewish young people should be expressing, the idea that "Judaism speaks for all Jews."

Activist flame

The other aspect of the project, with the ultimate goal of keeping the activist flame and renewed Jewish energy alive after the tour ends, will centre on both international and local causes.

All the cities involved in the tour will focus on the issue of Israeli MiA soldiers believed still to be alive in Arab countries, with part of the proceeds of the Montreal concert earmarked for Le Mercaz.

And while the tour is being organized exclusively by students, Korda and Shore said they have received invaluable support and advice from local organizations such as the Jewish Cultural Association, and from such individuals as Morton Bessner, Evelyn Schacter, Irwin and Ariela Cotler, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, Rabbi Joshua Shmidman, Samuel and Brenda Gewurtz, and Simon Ben-Simon.

Almost more than anything else, the two students want people to know that the tour will not be a one–shot deal.

It will be followed up, they said, with seminars, Jewish learning sessions, Shabbatons and other activities, such as weekly sessions of the Late Night Wake Up Society, described as an "open-minded Jewish learning group."

"The post concert experience is an essential part of this," Shore said. "The concert itself is the spark-plug."

More information on the Wake Up Tour is available by contacting Korda, at 931-4044 [Korda@ acc ent.net]; Shore, at 486-7978 [Shore @netAxis.qc.ca]; or the general e-mail address, [shlien@ total.net].

Exhibit aids scholarships

Amir Pichhadze's bold and evocative art is currently on exhibit at the Samuel J. Zacks Gallery at York University's Stong College until March 13.

Pichhadze has decided to donate part of the proceeds to an annual student scholarship at York.

"My greatest reward is in sharing my talent and success by helping others," he said.

Pichhadze, a second-year student in York's Visual Arts program, works with both oil paints and pastels. His work has been shown in jury exhibitions in Toronto, New York and Israel.

Vancouver CJA fundraising surges towards $4 million

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The 1997 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) of greater Vancouver is "on track for $4 million," according to the chair of the campaign.

Dr. Jonathan Berkowitz made the announcement at the annual general meeting of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV). Berkowitz said he expected the $4 million mark to be reached by the end of February. If the campaign succeeds in reaching that amount, it will exceed by eight percent the 1996 CJA campaign total of $3.7 million.

Berkowitz, who is also the federation president, made his report to an audience of approximately 75 federation board members, agency executive directors and other community insiders, who gathered recently in the L'Chaim Seniors Centre of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver.

Berkowitz said the CJA campaign, which began last September, was more than just a financial success. "The '97 campaign had a very positive atmosphere that wasn't always present in the past," he said. "There was a noticeably improved community feeling of support."

JFGV's financial statements, presented by treasurer Esther Mogyoros, showed that last fiscal year's revenues and expenditures statement (as of Aug. 31 1997) showed a small surplus of $4,000 that takes into account a reconciliation between 1996 and 1997 pledge revenues.

Dr. Jonathan Berkowitz

"We're really pleased that federation was on budget last year," said Berkowitz. The favorable results were due to tighter financial control and attention to fiscal management, he said.

Some 350 to 400 volunteer canvassers took part in the 1997 campaign, "an increase over the number who participated last year," said Berkowitz. Approximately 200 of these canvassers were women.

The Women's Division contributed just over $1 million "and counting," according to chair Rose Mikelberg. That figure represents an increase of between two and three percent over the amount raised last year by the Women's Division.

"The Women's Division has traditionally been very successful in raising money for campaign," said Mikelberg. "It has raised progressively larger amounts every year."

Mikelberg said the Women's Division will continue to play an increasingly greater role in future campaigns. "Women are an 'emerging market' for campaign," she noted. "Females are the fastest-growing segment in Jewish fundraising in not only greater Vancouver, but in North America as a whole."

The chair of the 1998 CJA campaign is also a woman. Sondra Ritter, who acted as co-chair of the Business and Trade Division in the 1997 general campaign, is the first woman to be named to the post in the Lower Mainland.

"I think it's good that a woman has been given the chance to chair the general campaign," said Ritter. "It shows that women have something to offer the campaign as a whole."

Although the 1997 campaign has not yet officially been completed, the 1998 campaign is already underway.

"I've had a couple of preliminary meetings, and have found a number of people to act as division heads," said Ritter. "I hope to have the campaign cabinet in place by April."

Seniors program may be extended

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A popular Shalom Village outreach program for seniors will be extended from one morning per week to two, provided there is sufficient response, says program director, Shelley Waxman.

There already is a great deal of interest, she says. "People ask to be on the mailing list, and they are calling us all the time."

Currently, about 15 to 20 seniors attend the Wednesday morning program at Shalom Village Nursing Home. Most are widowed and living alone and the program provides contact with other people, Waxman says.

Some participants are picked up by the Shalom Village van, some by DARTS (Disabled and Aged Regional Transport System), some are brought by a family member and several more come in from the residence next door.

The morning begins at 10 a.m. with a half-hour of socializing over tea or coffee and muffins. Then it's chair exercises led by a fourth-year McMaster University kinesiology student, a hot buffet lunch served by volunteers, and then the main part of the program.

Programs include lectures on a variety of topics such as fire prevention; an art class or a demonstration by a 95-year-old master weaver; outings to the Royal Botanical Gardens; a trip to Niagara-on-the Lake; or a show at Hamilton Place. But as Waxman points out, "when we plan a trip we have to consider people's abilities."

The additional Tuesday program would be entirely "an in-house program, with discussions, for instance, and intellectually stimulating games."

Participant Bertha Ortmann, originally from Berlin, came to Canada from London in 1948. She doesn't drive and the outreach program is a good way to get out and meet with friends. She finds the program varied and interesting and the exercises are popular, she adds.

For Polish-born Reva Aronowitz, outreach is a way of making new friends. She moved here from Montreal four months ago in order to be near her only daughter and two grandchildren, but already she's quite at home. "It's a great program and Shelley is doing an excellent job," she says.

Shabbat singles dinners offered by Vancouver congregation

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish community in British Columbia's Lower Mainland is the third largest and the fastest growing in Canada.

But despite the fact that an estimated 20,000 to 25,000 Jews now call the greater Vancouver area home, many singles find themselves at loose ends, especially on Friday nights.

"There are many Jewish people here with no connections or attachments to the community," said Anne Goldberg, executive director of Congregation Schara Tzedeck, Vancouver's oldest Orthodox synagogue. "Nobody who lives here seems to have actually been born and raised in Vancouver; everybody seems to come from somewhere else. And, to make matters worse, there appear to be fewer things for Jewish singles in Vancouver to do than in other Canadian cities."

In April 1997, Goldberg and Schara Tzedeck decided to do something about the situation by organizing Friday night Shabbat dinners for singles.

"Many singles spend Friday night at home alone," Goldberg said. "Either they don't have family here or they don't want to impose on their friends. It's those people we're targeting with our program. Before our Shabbatons began, there weren't any Friday night programs exclusively for singles."

Anne Goldberg

The first singles Shabbat dinner held at Schara Tzedeck attracted about 70 people. "The people who attended reacted very positively," Goldberg reported. "They told us they had had a wonderful time, and that the program filled a real need for them."

The idea for the Friday evening Shabbatons for singles came from a similar program the synagogue joined about 10 years ago. "Our synagogue participated in the Shabbas Across America program, organized by the National Jewish Outreach Program of New York," said Goldberg.

"Shabbas Across America, which is aimed primarily at families, brings 'beginner' Jews into a Jewish 'inner circle' at Friday night Sabbath programs that combine a religious service and dinner afterwards."

The families' program was so successful that Schara Tzedeck decided to "customize" it for singles.

The singles Shabbat dinners take place approximately every two months. Representing the synagogue are Goldberg; Rev. Joseph Marciano, the synagogue's mashgiach, and his family; and occasionally, cantor Yaacov Orzech. Rabbi Daniel Epstein, head of Judaic studies at Maimonides Secondary School, the Lower Mainland's only Jewish high school, officiates at the services.

Friday evening services 'user-friendly Orthodox'

Goldberg describes the services, which take place after the regular Friday evening service, as "user-friendly Orthodox.

"Many of the people who attend are not familiar with the Friday service. Rabbi Epstein goes through the service slowly, explaining the meaning and significance of the prayers. He makes it very accessible to people."

The service is followed by dinner, singing, storytelling and discussions. The whole evening lasts two to three hours.

"It's a traditional, friendly Shabbat dinner," said Goldberg. Normal attendance at the dinners is approximately 50; the maximum to date is 80.

Schara Tzedeck has made efforts to encourage the members of several Jewish singles groups in the Lower Mainland, including Jewish Solos, the Teva Club and the Party Mob, to attend the Friday evening dinners.

Goldberg believes the evenings are a success. "People keep coming back. Not only that, they tell their friends, and then their friends come."

The next dinner is tentatively slated to take place at the end of March, just before Pesach. For information, contact Congregation Schara Tzedeck at 604-736-7607.

Anti-Semitic incidents up in Winnipeg: B'nai Brith

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — B'nai Brith Canada's Winnipeg office has announced a slight increase in the number of anti-Semitic incidents in Winnipeg in 1997.

The organization reported in a press release last month that there were 18 incidents last year, compared to 17 the year before. The overall national level has declined," the press release said.

The most notable incident occured last September when a Jewish employee arrived at work one morning to find swastikas and anti-Semitic graffiti at his work station. That same month, a woman was threatened with firing for requesting time off to observe Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Last March, three teens broke into a house and spray-painted it with swastikas and anti-Semitic slogans. The residents, however, aren't Jewish. The youths were arrested.

In total, there were six acts of vandalism and 12 cases of harassment, including one assault. Not included in the list, because the motive was unknown, was an incident in December where an unknown person fired a bullet into the Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue in south Winnipeg.

"The reporting procedures we have in place are working well," says David Davis, Manitoba chair for the League for Human Rights. "We are able to get on the cases quickly. There is obviously more education that still has to take place."

BBC forms coalition

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) has formed a coalition with English rights lobby group Alliance Quebec and the partitionist Quebec Committee for Canada to demand equal funding from the Quebec government for its support of the federal government's seeking of a Supreme Court reference on the legality of Quebec unilaterally declaring independence.

The coalition was formed in response to the Parti Québécois (PQ) giving $300,000 to the group Pro-Démocratie, which is opposed to the Supreme Court's dealing with the issue.

BBC regional executive director Robert Libman said the coalition, which supports "the rule of law and primacy of the Canadian constitution," should receive the same amount of public money for promoting a different point of view.

"Quebec is presently in a pre-election/referendum period. To suddenly cough up $300,000 to favor one side is the height of hypocrisy, especially after [the PQ government's] righteous defence of the need for a level playing field, which they repeated ad nauseam before the courts throughout their defence of Quebec's referendum law."

Book surveys anti-Semitism

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Lionel Steiman sees his newly released Paths to Genocide: Antisemitism in Western History (published by MacMillan Press in Great Britain and St. Martin's Press in the United States) as an attempt to bridge the gulf between broader general books on the subject and those highly specialized studies that are beyond the scope of the average reader.

"My book is for the serious reader, those who are academically inclined with an interest in this subject yet are not specialists," says the longtime University of Manitoba history professor who teaches a course on the history of anti-Semitism.

"I do not claim to be contributing new knowledge on the subject," he says. "Rather, I have attempted to synthesize a number of major scholarly works covering the period from the Middle Ages to the late 19th century."

The question of anti-Semitism is something that began to percolate in the back of his mind when he was a child growing up in north Winnipeg, he says. Although he never experienced anti-Semitism personally, he comes from a mixed Jewish-Christian background (his father was Jewish) and, he says, he was always aware of his two sets of relatives and the differences between Christians and Jews. As well, graphic magazine photos of concentration camp survivors left an indelible impression on his young mind.

He actually began his research into the history of anti-Semitism in 1983 in preparation for the course that he introduced three years later.

He began working on the book about 10 years ago.

Anti-Semitism, he says, has been an intrinsic part of the western cultural tradition for most of the last 2,000 year. Since the Holocaust though, there has been a huge change in attitude.

"It used to be respectable," he notes. "People didn't feel they had to apologize for it or speak in hushed tones. Now, it is no longer the socially significant force it used to be.

"I am not saying that it is no longer a problem or that it has disappeared. It is good that we have organizations like B'nai Brith that monitor it. But anti-Semitism is no longer part of the cultural baggage that students bring to university with them, for example, as it was when I was attending university in the early 1950s. Most kids today view Jews as just another ethnic group."

He suggests that this is partly a result of a decline in interest in Christianity. Most students don't know enough about Christianity to be anti-Semitic, he suggests.

"You need a certain amount of Christian baggage in order to view Jews in the role of the other."

Shuls hit by arson

He said the fires at his shul blew out the window of a men's washroom, scorched an exterior wall and damaged a permanent sukkah outside.

"We are a small, tightly-knit community, and now is the time to come together," Santopinto said. "We have great confidence in the judicial system. The police have been wonderful.

"London is a diverse ethnic community, and we've always had the sense that we were safe. We still feel safe."

William Klein, president of Or Shalom, said damage to his 300-family member synagogue was minimal.

These were the first attacks against the Jewish community here in memory.

"People are buzzing," said Hillel Boroditsky, executive director of the London Jewish Federation. Some among the city's 2,700 Jews have been shaken and worried, he said, but overall, the community is handling the incidents well.

A meeting among the federation and all synagogues was scheduled for this Wednesday to review security.

Boroditsky said widespread media coverage of the fires has been more upsetting to the community than the fires themselves.

Concerns of an orchestrated attack by anti-Semites were somewhat allayed when police arrested a lone suspect.

Jonathan Bishinsky, 38, of London, has been charged with one count of arson in the Beth Tefilah fire. He appeared in court Monday morning for a bail hearing. Police have not yet laid a charge in the Or Shalom fire.

Insp. David Lucio of London's police department said further charges may be laid.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, is satisfied the police acted quickly.

"The community appeares to be calm," added CJC's Danny Fine.

Early indications are that this was not a hate crime, Fine said.

School reunion planned

MONTREAL — The students who graduated from Jewish People's Schools in 1948 are planning a 50th anniversary reunion on May 24.

However, they can't find all the graduates. In particular, they are looking for Marvin Brown, Benny Clemens, Aubie Levine, Irving Silver, Harvey Thau and Rose Taub Bush.

Information on these people should be directed to Sheldon Weinstein at Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools, 5170 Van Horne Ave., Montreal, H3W 1J6, telephone 514-731-3843 or fax 514-731-0343.

The date was chosen to coincide with a Baron Byng High School reunion.

Members of the class of '48 will look at the modern Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools (JPPS) and Bialik facilities – two elementary schools and a high school. (Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools merged in 1971 and Bialik High School was established in 1972.)

The schools will mark their 85th anniversary in September, having educated more than 50,000 students.

UBC's Hillel House brings Yiddish alive for students

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Faith Jones says learning Yiddish is like being in high school again.

Jones, a first year graduate student in library science at the University of British Columbia (UBC) has been studying Yiddish for a year-and-a-half. She says, however, "it's still hard work."

She is one of six students taking a weekly Yiddish language course at UBC's Hillel House. She also attends another weekly Yiddish class at the Vancouver Peretz Institute.

Jones, who was raised in a secular Jewish home, says "When I was little, my grandmother used to speak Yiddish, and I loved the sound of the language. I felt very close to my grandmother. Speaking Yiddish was important to her and it's also important to me."

Michelle Gumprich, who teaches the Hillel class, also feels a personal connection with the language. She is an education graduate of the University of Saskatchewan, and grew up in Saskatoon with barely a word of Yiddish around her.

"For me Yiddish is a love, a passion. I'm a 26-year-old Canadian woman who wants to speak the language of my ancestors. Yiddish is my connection to an identity that is humanistic, non-religious and a defiance of Hitler," she says.

Gumprich thought of running a Yiddish course in the mid-'90s, when she was Hillel program director, but she was unable to find an instructor.

Last summer, deciding it was time for her to learn the language, she enrolled in an intensive six-week course at the Uriel Wejnreich Summer Program for Yiddish Literature, Language and Culture at Columbia University. "I was exposed to Yiddishkeit through lectures on everything from Rival Yiddish Dialects to Women and the Bund. I sang and danced Yiddish, I ate Yiddish, I watched Yiddish films and, eventually, I spoke Yiddish, too."

Although, at the start of the course she possessed nothing more than a desire to learn, by the end Gumprich had mastered enough of the language to be able to teach elementary Yiddish conversation.

After she had returned to Vancouver, Gumprich convinced Hillel's current program director, Daniella Weber, to let her offer a Yiddish course. The class was advertised to Hillel members by e-mail and by posters inside Hillel House.

Gumprich says that, although Poland was the centre of pre-war Yiddish language culture, other regions of Europe made important contributions as well. "There are four different Yiddish dialect groups," she says. "Lithuanian is a more literary Yiddish. The Polish variant was used by the majority of Yiddish speakers. And there are also Galician and Romanian dialects. They're all quite different."

'Beautiful language'

About 80 percent of Yiddish vocabulary is derived from German, says Gumprich. Hebrew is the source of another 10 percent, with Slavic and the local national tongue each lending five percent.

"If you think Yiddish is not useful as a spoken language, go to the Lower East Side," says Gumprich. "Speaking Yiddish is the key to getting the bargains. A friend and I charmed a store owner into selling us clafs [the mezuzah scroll] for a great price. By the end of the transaction, she was ready to take us home and feed us chicken soup with knedlach, and for me some schmaltz because I'm too thin."

Jones says that all the hard work she has put into Yiddish is paying off. "I can understand a lot, and I can say a few things now, too."

She believes everybody – not just Jews – should learn Yiddish. "It's a beautiful language, and we should do all we can to keep it alive. It would be a great shame to let it die. If we don't do it, who will?"

Fashion show to celebrate work of Israeli designers

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The creme de la creme and the hottest rising stars in Israel's fashion industry will be featured at a fashion show organized by State of Israel Bonds in Winnipeg May 14, in celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary.

The show, titled From Sabra Style to Cutting-Edge Chic, will feature swimwear designs by Gottex, Gideon Oberson's haute couture collection, Dorin Frankfurt's fashions for the millennium, and a tribute to Israel's past in the designs of recent graduates of the Shenkar College of Textile Technology and Design.

Textiles and apparel is Israel's fifth-largest industry and one of the country's major employers. The industry represents nine percent of GNP and employs more than 54,000 people.

In addition to the fashion show, that evening Israel Bonds will honor 12 outstanding individuals, couples and organizations for their contributions to the Jewish community here and their ongoing support of Israel.

The honorees include the Asper Foundation (Israel Asper is the honorary chair of the evening), Mona and Gerald Gray, Drs. Lyonel and Esther Israels, Justice Guy Kroft and Hester Kroft, Rabbi Akiba Lubow, Laurie Mainster, Hope and Howard Morry, Gordon Pullan, Fanny and Charles Shore, Fannie and Abe Simkin, The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, and Marion and Ed Vickar.

A similar fashion show is planned for Toronto's Yorkdale Shopping Centre in the Bay Court, March 8 at 8 p.m. Proceeds benefit Mount Sinai Hospital.

Royal Lighting offers lamps and fixtures to suit every budget, need and taste. "Our selection," says Royal's Michael Gladstone, "is probably Toronto's best."

Here, you'll find hundreds of varieties of lamps in every price, size, style and colour: halogen and non-halogen; modern and traditional; table, desk, wall, floor, study and reading lamps. You can buy shades separately, too.

There are line voltage track lights for halogen & regular bulbs, and low-voltage track lights for halogen. Royal carries many specialty bulbs, track and recess lighting, and bulbs by the case.

In addition, Royal carries a wide crystal selection, both in traditional styles, and less ornate, square-cut forms to suit contemporary tastes. Crystal goes well with traditional furniture and decor, and crystal for more contemporary decor.

With today's emphasis on elegance, both modern and traditional crystal are enjoying a revival; traditional French styles, for example, are very popular. Let Royal's staff help match your choice to your home, and answer technical questions, (i.e. the colour and degree of brilliance in crystal).

Royal's expert staff know what questions to ask you, so that you go home with what you want. Suppose it's a lamp or chandelier, for example: they'll ask about window illumination, wall colour, fixture location and other variables, including your tastes. "We're a full-service store," Gladstone emphasizes. "When you spend money, you want personal attention."

You'll find Royal Lighting at 1549 Avenue Road; call (416) 782-1129.

Corningware for high tech or home

For centuries, glassware has had a place of honour in the kitchen and dining room. Smooth and non-porous, it's healthful and easily cleaned; bacteria and odours don't linger; acids, spices and salts won't pit or stain it. It absorbs, retains and transfers heat, and doesn't warp or bend.

Since 1915, Corning Inc. has pioneered heat-resistant glass ovenware. Each cookware product is made from a special formula; each is transparent to microwave energy, and can pass directly from freezer to microwave. Most Canadian households have some Corning products, which are respected and imitated world-wide.

Corning's Visions cookware is clear, tempered glass ceramic. Suitable for any cooking method or heat source, it's ideal for water-based cooking and extreme temperature changes.

The Pyrex trademark is so popular people think it's a generic name; it has been at home in kitchens for almost 80 years. While not for use on a stove element or under a broiler, it withstands oven temperatures. Pyrex, available in a number of colours, is ideal for baking, serving or storing, unites fashion and function.

Corelle Dinnerware has the durable, light, semi-translucent look of fine china. It's chip-and-break-resistant, dishwasher safe, and resistant to oven heat; its styles match table settings from bold to elegant.

Corningware and Corning French White, not quite so thin as bone china but much less costly, is among the finest dinnerware lines you can buy.

Revere stainless steel cookware is attractive and long-wearing. Copper-clad or with aluminum disc bottoms, it has superb heat spreading properties, and is non-sticking. Revere Pro cookware is near-commercial quality.

Corelle Co-ordinates includes counter savers, and thermal servers to keep beverages hot or cold. There are glasses, teapots, cream and sugar sets, gravy boats, utensils and soft goods like placemats and oven mitts.

Corning consults forward-thinking designers and appliance makers, and has one of the world's foremost research facilities. They also make the ceramic space shuttle tiles and laser parts; and the technology they bring into your kitchen is state-of-the-art.

Corning asks you, the customer, what you like or dislike about products and designs; patterns and products to meet your needs. All products come with a use, care and safety booklet, and a warranty.

Einstein's 'greatest day'

By DAN IZENBERG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Seventy-five years ago last month, Albert Einstein paid his first and only visit to the Land of Israel to witness the accomplishments of the 90,000 Jews living here at that time, and to present the first scientific address ever delivered at the Hebrew University.

Historians of the brilliant physicist paid virtually no attention to his brief visit in February 1923, according to Ze'ev Rozenkranz, curator of the Albert Einstein Archives at the Hebrew University.

All we know of Einstein's visit derives from his rather stenographic diary entries, handwritten in German, plus accounts in the two Hebrew papers of the day – Doar Hayom and Ha'aretz – and the English-language Palestine Weekly.

Einstein arrived in Palestine shortly after being awarded the Nobel Prize. His general theory of relativity had been published in 1916, in the middle of World War I. Because of the hostilities, however, it was only scientifically verified in May 1919. Six months later, Einstein and his discovery became famous throughout the world.

Einstein was a proud Jew, a modernist and an internationalist, and all these qualities come through in the terse entries he made during his stay here.

He believed in Ahad Ha'am's idea of cultural and spiritual Zionism and, as such, was a strong advocate of the proposed Hebrew University. Two years before coming to Palestine, he accompanied Chaim Weizmann on a tour of the United States to raise money for its medical faculty.

Einstein and his wife Elsa reached Port Said on February 1, 1923.

After crossing the Sinai Peninsula by train and reaching the coastal plain, he recorded his first impression of the Holy Land: "We travelled along a plain with very meagre vegetation. From time to time, Arab villages and Jewish colonies, olive trees, cactus plants and orange trees flashed by."

The following day, Einstein's train stopped at Lod (Lydda) and he was met by Zionist leaders, including Menachem Ussishkin, Benzion Mosinson, Meir Dizengoff and David Yellin.

From there, he travelled past "a spectacular valley of rocks, to Jerusalem," where he was met by Shlomo Ginzburg, the son of Ahad Ha'am, who had been appointed by the Zionist Executive to be Einstein's official escort.

The following day, Samuel took his guest to the Old City. On his way there, Einstein saw a "stern, bare, hilly landscape, breathtakingly beautiful, with white houses, some of them capped with domes, and a blue sky. The city is also beautiful, crammed into the square walls."

On Sunday, Einstein visited Jericho and called it a day of "unforgettable brilliance."

On Monday he was taken to see the new Jewish neighborhood of Bnei Bayit (later renamed Beit Hakerem.)

"The workers have no previous experience or training, and yet, in a short time, do wonderful work. The managers don't earn more than the workers," he wrote.

The next day, Einstein gave an impassioned speech at thenow-defunct Lemel School . "I consider this the greatest day of my life," he said. "Hitherto, I have always found something to regret in the Jewish soul, and that is the forgetfulness of its own people – forgetfulness of its being, almost. Today, I have been made happy by the sight of the Jewish people learning to recognize themselves and to make themselves recognized as a force in the world.

"This is a great age, the age of the liberation of the Jewish soul. And it has been accomplished through the Zionist movement, which has remained a spiritual movement, so that no one in the world will be able to destroy it."

The highlight of the visit came the following day, when Einstein delivered a speech on the theory of relativity, attended by British High Commissioner Samuel, senior British officials, Jewish and Christian notables, heads of Jewish institutions and scientists from Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Moslem notables were also invited but declined to attend, the Hebrew papers reported at the time.

Einstein began his speech in Hebrew, which, he recorded, he could barely read. As a gesture to his audience, few of whom knew German, Einstein gave his speech in French and said, with self-deprecating humor, that if his listeners did not understand him it would not be because of the material, but because of his poor French.

Afterwards, he walked the length of the hill where the Hebrew University was to be built.

During the next few days, Einstein visited Tel Aviv, Jaffa, Mikve Yisrael, Haifa, the Jezreel Valley and Lake Kinneret.

After a day-long tour of Tel Aviv, he wrote: "What the Jews have done in the city in just a few years is incredible. A modern, Hebrew city bursting with economic and spiritual life which is created out of the soil. It is hard to believe what an urban people we Jews are."

Einstein also wrote about the agricultural and industrial accomplishments of the pioneers.

At the Mikve Yisrael Agricultural School, he was impressed by the artificial techniques developed to hatch chicken eggs. At Rishon Lezion, he was impressed by the size of the winery.

Heading north to Haifa, Einstein visited the Reali High School and the Technion. He also stopped over at the home of an unidentified Arab friend, where he was visited by an Arab author and his German wife.

"The Arab man-on-the-street hardly knows anything about nationalism," he observed.

Later, on the way to the Kinneret, Einstein visited Nahalal, which was under construction, and Nazareth. He stayed over at a private estate at Migdal and drove along the Kinneret, which he described as "landscape similar to Lake Geneva. The sun bursts forth and the surroundings are fertile but suffer from the plague of malaria."

Einstein made his way back to Port Said on February 14 and from there to Germany where he resumed his position at the Berlin Academy of Research. In 1930, he accepted a position at the Institute of Advanced Studies in Princeton University where he remained for the rest of his life. He died in 1955 at the age of 76. Three years earlier, he had rejected an offer to become the second president of the state of Israel.

"All my life I have dealt with objective matters," he explained. "Hence I lack both the natural aptitude and the experience to deal properly with people and to exercise official functions... I am more distressed over these circumstances because my relationship to the Jewish people has become my strongest human bond, ever since I became fully aware of our precarious situation among the nations of the world."

Israeli intelligence helped expose Iraqi germ program

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israel provided vital information that helped force an Iraqi official in 1995 to admit to developing biological weapons, according to the New York Times.

The Times published an investigation last week reporting that Israeli intelligence officials had given documents to the United Nations Special Commission for Iraq (Unscom), the UN inspections team that has been trying to uncover information about Iraq's weapons programs.

Without the documents, UN inspectors might have been forced to give Baghdad a clean bill of health and abandon their weapons-inspection program.

By 1994, Unscom's biological team had discovered the existence of a clandestine Iraqi group known as the Technical and Scientific Materials Import Division, that appeared to supply a potential germ factory in Iraq.

Unscom pressured Baghdad

But the team needed more information in order to pressure Iraq to abandon its denials regarding its production of biological weapons. So in December 1994, it wrote to a handful of nations, asking if they had any information about biological materials sales to Baghdad.

Intelligence experts cited by the Times say that Israel provided copies documenting sales of 10 tons of growth media in the 1980s from a British company named Oxoid to Iraq.

Growth media, which are used to feed and breed germs, have many legitimate uses in hospitals and clinics. But the large amount of the media imported by Iraq indicated that Iraq was using them to fill biological weapons.

Armed with this information, Unscom officials pressured Baghdad. In a few months, their efforts paid off: In July 1995, Dr. Rihab Taha, the acknowledged leader of Baghdad's civilian germ effort, admitted, for the first time, that Iraq had produced germs for biological warfare.

Commandos find Scuds

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Israeli commandos operating behind Iraqi lines have found evidence of Scud missiles, according to the London-based newsletter Foreign Report.

The Israelis have been operating in Iraq's western desert – which Iraq used as a launching pad for 39 Scud attacks on Israel during the 1991 Gulf War – in a bid to reduce the chances of a new Scud attack in case of renewed fighting in the Gulf.

The newsletter also reports that Israeli, American and British special forces operating inside Iraq are unlikely to be withdrawn in the immediate future, despite this week's agreement between Baghdad and the United Nations.

The forces were part of the preparations for military action against the regime of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to force compliance with UN demands for unlimited access to weapons sites.

Quoting U.S. sources in Amman, Jordan, and in the Israeli air force, the newsletter says that in addition to searching for Scud missile bases, the units have been conducting reconnaissance missions of Iraqi troop movements, as well as preparing drills for rescuing downed American and British pilots and arranging hideouts.

Russia's cooperation sought

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky flew to Moscow last Sunday to nail down a Russian commitment against supplying dual-purpose nuclear technology and ballistic missile components and expertise to Iran.

Except for a meeting with Russian industrialists, Sharansky's talks with Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov will focus on prospects of developing strategical cooperation between Russia and Israel, an aide said.

"Sharansky is certain that Russia is well on its way to regaining its status as a superpower and therefore believes it is essential for its relationship with Israel to be positive and mutually advantageous," he went on.

The prospective meeting with Chernomyrdin is scheduled in advance of the Russian leader's planned rendezvous in Washington with U.S. Vice-President Al Gore. There too Russia's involvement in Iran's ballistic missile program will be the central issue.

Two weeks ago, Sharansky met Gore in Washington to discuss efforts to encourage Russia to refrain from nuclear and missile cooperation with Iran.

The trip is Sharansky's second to his native land since his release from a Soviet prison in a 1986 East-West prisoner swap.

Last week, Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi visited Russia, where he and his counterparts pledged to abide fully by the United Nations charter and international obligations in working together in the field of civil nuclear power.

Bridging Israel's great divide

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

If two prominent Knesset members have their way, observant and secular Israeli Jews will soon embark on intense "final-status" talks to resolve their many bitter disputes.

To that end, Alex Lubotzky, a moderate Orthodox member of the centrist Third Way party who has been a driving force in efforts to resolve the conversion crisis, and Yossi Beilin, the Labor party architect of the Oslo accords, recently released a draft document dubbed the New Covenant on Religion and State.

The release of the document comes in the wake of the apparent failure to secure agreement on a proposed solution to the conversion crisis.

Earlier this month, the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate rejected the Ne'eman Committee's recommendation to involve Reform and Conservative rabbis in preparing prospective converts while retaining Orthodox control over the actual conversions.

The Lubotzky-Beilin document, while backing the Ne'eman Committee approach, is much broader in scope. Indeed, it goes beyond the recent debate over the lack of recognition for non-Orthodox streams in Israel.

It addresses some of the most hotly disputed issues confronting Israeli society, including the notion of civil marriages and burials, the broadening of Jewish education to reflect all the religious movements and military service for Haredim.

It was drawn up with the help of Meimad, the moderate Orthodox movement, and Drachim, an institute dedicated to bridging the religious and secular divide – a gap that in recent months has occasionally turned violent.

But the ambitious covenant's chances of success may be similar to that of the Ne'eman Committee.

Dozens of secular and moderate Orthodox leaders are ready to back the pact, say Beilin and Lubotzky, who see the accord as a framework for discussion and legislation.

But without support from Israel's increasingly powerful haredi community, say experts, the initiative may be doomed to failure.

"This is not an ideological statement, it's a practical document listing the problems disputed in Israel and making suggestions for solving each one," Lubotzky said in an interview.

The goal, he explained, is to solve the quandary of the "status quo" – the agreements on religion and state struck between David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, and the Orthodox religious establishment.

"The idea of the status quo was to freeze issues of religion and state so that we won't fight with each other," said Lubotzky. "But the truth is, we are fighting all the time, and both sides are unhappy with the status quo."

Beilin agreed. "The most important point here is that we are ready to touch the taboo of the status quo," he said.

Draft covenant

Unease with the status quo, states the covenant, is the common denominator uniting religious and secular Israelis.

To deal with the problem, the covenant addresses a dilemma posed by the fundamental definition of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state.

"The democratic and pluralistic character of Israeli society has been progressively deteriorating," it states. "On the other hand, there is a widespread feeling that the State of Israel's Jewish character has been weakened, and Israel may become a society in which Jewish culture is not central."

To solve the problem, the two lawmakers are promoting a Jewish education curriculum to be taught alongside a curriculum on democracy and human rights in all public schools.

Representatives from all walks of Jewish life would draw up the program by participating in a council that would also be responsible for addressing Israel-Diaspora issues.

The covenant also calls for setting up a framework for civil marriages, divorces and burials. But the Chief Rabbinate is unlikely to relinquish its control over these rituals.

The document also recommends a trade-off regarding the public observance of the Sabbath and Jewish holidays: The Orthodox would agree to allow places of entertainment to open, as well as limited public transportation. At the same time, commerce and industry would be shut down.

This could be relatively easy to implement, since in many Israeli cities, aside from transportation, this arrangement is already a fait accompli.

The covenant also envisions compulsory military service for haredi Jews.

But getting the Haredim into uniform will not be easy – the status quo has allowed them to avoid military service by studying in yeshivot.

According to the document, the army would create special programs to accommodate their needs. Beilin said this issue was not created in an effort to alienate the haredi community from the proposed accord. "We would like to open a dialogue with them," he said.

But Knesset member Shlomo Benizri, of the Shas party, is not looking for such a dialogue. He said in an interview that the covenant addresses an "artificial" crisis invented by the Israeli left.

"Secular Israelis can live their lives today as they please," he said. "There is no need for a covenant when there are no problems. We are in favor of tolerance while maintaining the status quo."

Benizri need not worry, according to Moshe Lissak, a sociology professor at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and an expert on the rifts in Israeli society.

"I doubt this covenant has a chance," he said. "It is an agreement between the most moderate religious Zionists and the secular public, and it doesn't address some of the focal issues, such as the massive funds that flow to [haredi] yeshivot and allow them to constantly increase their power."

At the same time, Meretz, the left-wing secular party, has not yet taken an official position.

Two crewmen killed in IDF jet fighter crash

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An air force F-15 flying low over the West Bank last Sunday in a routine training run hit an antenna on Mount Eval, outside Nablus, and crashed into a nearby mountain. The two aviators died instantly.

They were identified as pilot Maj. Uriel Kolton, 27, from Bat Yam, and weapons officer Capt. Uri Manor, 21, from Haifa.

OC Air Force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu appointed an internal inquiry to be headed by a colonel. IAF flight training was halted for a day.

The advanced F-15D had been flying at a height of about 2,000 metres at sea when, at around 10 a.m., it headed east in a simulated attack, said Brig.-Gen. Avner Naveh, chief of the air branch.

He said that the jet swooped down to about 1,260 metres. The entire attack was to have lasted two to three minutes.

The peak of Mt. Eval, one of the highest mountains in Samaria, is bristling with military antennas. Most pilots are aware of them. Kolton was a deputy squadron commander and considered a veteran pilot. He radioed in that the weather was not bad, and that he could carry on with the simulated attack. It was the last word received from him.

The plane hit one of the antennas while flying at a speed of some 800 kilometres an hour

Senior officers believe that the jet exploded on contact with the 80-metre-high antenna and that chunks of the aircraft fell into a nearby wadi, after which what remained of the plane ground its way up the next hill, leaving a charred trail of pieces.

Shuki Levine, security officer of the Samaria Regional Council, described the crash on Army Radio.

"There was a strong explosion and a mushroom cloud over Mount Eval. We saw pieces of the plane. We wanted to save the survivors if there were any. But there was nothing left to talk about," Levine said.

The IAF is to investigate whether clouds in the area blocked the pilot's view of the antenna, or whether it was a case of human error. The likelihood of technical malfunction is considered low, but the possibility is also being examined.

The weather was borderline, but it was more likely that the crewmen missed sighting the antenna because they were intensely concentrating on the exercise when the crash occurred.

The F-15D was the most advanced model of the U.S.-built jet until the arrival this year of the F-15I. The F-15I has a terrain-following radar system that experts believe could have prevented this type of accident.

Very shortly after the plane disappeared from radar, IAF helicopters and rescue crews converged on the site. IDF troops were brought in for ground searches.

The F-15D does not have a black box, but carries equipment that videotapes its flights. The video, if found, could provide clues to what happened. Air force officials would not say whether they had found it.

The last time an F-15 crashed was on January 20, 1997, but the crewmen managed to bail out. In that accident, the aircraft apparently hit a flock of storks and plummeted into a cow shed at Kibbutz Revivim.

Indictments expected

By GALIT LIPKIS BECK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — More indictments might soon be filed in the Maccabiah disaster case, Tel Aviv District Attorney Miriam Rosenthal said at a press conference last Sunday.

The state has already charged five people with causing death by negligence. Rosenthal said the indictments currently considered are related to charges resulting from building code violations, not negligence.

The Maccabiah case was treated very quickly and efficiently considering the complexity of the investigation, she said.

She emphasized that the speedy treatment was not due to pressure received from the Australian Jewish community.

Israel offers to leave southern Lebanon

the moment the Syrian channel reached the point that permitted it, Lebanon would be invoked."

The source said that throughout this stage of intermittent negotiations, Israel "did not want to upset the Syrian apple cart. We did not talk about Resolution 425 because we relied on the peace process."

The sea change in policy, as enunciated by Netanyahu and supported by Mordechai, he went on, is that "now we are talking about 425, which Lebanon has always wanted us to implement."

Resolution 425 was adopted by the UN body in 1978 after Operation Litani – an incursion that brought the IDF to the southern banks of the Litani river. It called for the IDF's withdrawal and interposed the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) as the intended peacekeeping buffer.

The source summarized the current initiative as a three-phased progression: IDF withdrawal, restoration of Lebanese sovereignty over the evacuated area, and the establishment of peace and security along the international border. "One is dependent on the other," he said.

He differentiated between the new approach and the former one to the extent that now "we are not talking about peace or normalization, but only about security." This requires that Israel and Lebanon sit down and and discuss the requisite arrangements, he went on. UNIFIL could serve as a facilitator, but not as the guarantor of tranquility along the border.

The source assumed that since the arrangements needed for peace and security directly relate to the local inhabitants, this would inevitably lead to mutually-acceptable assurances for the safety of the South Lebanon Army's officers and men.

MK Ephraim Sneh (Labor), a former IDF commander for the south Lebanon area had some criticism for the proposed withdrawal. He said that "accepting the UN resolution means abandoning the security of the northern communities."

Senior Syrian officials described Netanyahu's proposal as the "Lebanon First" idea in a new guise and another attempt by Israel to split the Lebanon and Syria tracks.

Both Lebanon and Syria made it clear that the only interpretation of 425 that they would accept would be a full and unconditional withdrawal without any security arrangements.

Vedrine supported their view.

Feb. 26

• The government reduced the number of gas mask distribution centres.

• Three soldiers were killed and three were wounded in south Lebanon when Hezbollah launched a mortar attack on their outpost at Karkum. The fallen soldiers are Assaf Rosenfeld, Yoni Dviri and Ronen Eshel.

Feb. 27

• Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai met with Abu Mazen, the man rumored to be the next chairman of the PA. The two discussed security arrangements for the airport to be built by the PA.

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM Feb. 23 (JTA) — The Haganah today appealed to the Jews of Palestine to remain calm and not take the law into their own hands as tension mounted throughout the country in the wake of the worst explosion in recent Palestine history; it took the lives of more than 50 Jews here yesterday. Thus far the total of known dead is 52, with nearly twice that many injured and wounded. A dozen more Britons and Jews were slain during the night in clashes between police and troops and Jewish civil guards and underground forces.

Calculated ambivalency

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A policy of calculated ambivalency guided the Palestine Authority (PA) during the latest Iraqi crisis.

Mideast Analysis

However, the Palestinian masses in the autonomous areas, especially Islamic fundamentalists, were fervently and unequivocably pro-Iraqi. They expressed sympathy for Iraq and its people, praised Saddam Hussein as an Arab hero willing and able to stand up to the United States and Israel, and denounced American military bravado.

As the crisis intensified, deepened by the prospect of a possible Iraqi refusal to cooperate unconditionally with UN weapons inspectors, the PA came out against the use of force to solve the problem, but advised Baghdad to comply fully with UN resolutions.

During the 1991 Gulf War, Palestinians cheered as Iraq fired missiles at Israel, the PLO backed Iraq and Yasser Arafat was photographed hugging Saddam Hussein. Arafat soon realized he had backed the wrong horse. Saudi Arabia, Yemen and the Arab Gulf states severed ties with the PLO and cut off all financial aid. Palestinian workers there were summarily expelled. The PLO was ostracized by Arab leaders, who had turned on Iraq following its invasion of Kuwait in August 1990.

This time around, with the political climate having changed, the PLO was determined not to blunder again. Israel and the PLO had signed the Oslo accords. The PA, therefore, could ill afford to antagonize Israel, its negotiating partner, or the United States, whose support and understanding it requires to advance its national agenda.

Yet the PA also recognized that there was grassroots dissatisfaction and frustration with the virtual breakdown of the peace process and the continued economic stagnation.

At the outset of the crisis, senior PA officials, such as Gaza police chief Mohammed Dahlan, said that the PA would take no steps to prevent pro-Iraqi demonstrations, as urged by Israel and the United States. But within days, following a series of Palestinian marches in Nablus, Jenin, Ramallah, Hebron and Gaza, during which Israeli and American flags were burned and protesters called for missiles to be lobbed at Israeli cities, the PA banned all demonstrations.

The ban was defied, and more pro-Iraqi rallies took place in towns and refugee camps in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. In response, the PA closed nine radio and television stations which had fanned pro-Iraqi feelings .

Fatah, the largest faction within the PLO and one controlled by Arafat, organized several pro-Iraqi demonstrations. The PA, concerned by the slippage of its popularity due in part to its suppression of dissent, did not challenge Fatah's democratic right to demonstrate.

But the PA imposed three conditions: No desecration of Israeli and American flags, no marches to Jewish religious sites, and no confrontations with the Israeli army.

Fatah ignored these demands. In Hebron, demonstrators threw bottles and stones at Israeli soldiers. When the troops reacted with rubber bullets, Palestinian policemen suddenly appeared, dispersing the rioters. One of the most violent demonstrations occurred in Gush Katif, when Palestinians attempted to tear down a fence being erected by Jewish settlers near Neveh Dekalim. As tempers flared, Palestinian policemen and Israeli soldiers pointed rifles at each other in a threatening gesture.

In Nablus, protesters tried to reach Joseph's Tomb (where six Israeli soldiers were killed during the course of widespread Palestinian rioting in September 1996). They were pushed back by PA police. In Bethlehem, a similar scenario unfolded at Rachel's Tomb. And in Khan Yunis, where Palestinians chanted, "Beloved Saddam, hit Tel Aviv," PA policemen did not even bother to intervene.

In a show of authority, the PA arrested 200 Fatah activists. But the events of the past few weeks have not gone unnoticed. The PA does not have a sufficiently firm grip on its people. Anti-Israel sentiment still runs deep. Some Palestinians continue to be seduced by Arab dictators masquerading as heroes.

Amnon Rubinstein, the former minister of education, has expressed support for the initiative.

Others in that camp have criticized Beilin for going too far by agreeing to Jewish education in all schools and not going far enough to separate religion and state.

Meretz and the Orthodox political parties could hold the keys to the accord's success or failure.

And although the fierce rhetoric between these two extremes in Israeli Jewish society has become commonplace, beneath the surface there are initial rumblings of change.

Since last summer, a small group of haredi lay leaders and Meretz activists have been quietly meeting in Jerusalem to discuss some of these thorny issues.

It is not a simple process, said Robert Terris, a Meretz member of the project's steering committee.

"But we are discovering that sitting and meeting 'the other' is fruitful, if only to shatter stereotypes, and to discover that you can vent your concerns and demands in an atmosphere of dialogue," he said.

Lithuania launches new war crimes charges

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Lithuania is pressing charges against a second man alleged to have participated in the murder of Jews during World War II.

Kazys Gimzauskas, 89, is suspected of giving orders to arrest, imprison and execute Jews while he was deputy chief of the Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian secret police, known as the Saugumas, from 1941 to 1944.

The Lithuanian Prosecutor General's Office has already sent to court the case of his wartime boss, who was in charge of the security police.

The trial of Aleksandras Lileikis, 90, was slated to open in a court in the Lithuanian capital of Vilnius this week.

Both Lileikis and Gimzauskas deny the charges. Gimzauskas said he and his former boss were "Lithuanian patriots" who belonged to the anti-Nazi resistance.

"Of course, I participated [in the underground], and this is no secret," Gimzauskas said in an interview last week.

He added that he has submitted to the authorities documents proving his anti-Nazi activities – as well as names of witnesses who could testify on his behalf.

The bedridden Gimzauskas said he would not be able to attend his own trial.

A court date for his trial has not been set.

Germany occupied Lithuania from 1941 to 1944, during which time approximately 94 percent of Lithuania's pre-war Jewish community of 240,000 died in the Holocaust. The Baltic country is now home to some 5,000 Jews.

Most historians say ordinary Lithuanians helped with the killings.

Gimzauskas moved to the United States in 1956 and lived in Saint Petersburg, Fla. He returned to Lithuania in 1993, while he was under investigation by the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations.

In 1996, he was stripped of his U.S. citizenship for lying about his wartime past on his immigration application.

Besides Gimzauskas and Lileikis, there are at least three more Lithuanians living in their homeland who have been stripped of their American citizenship.

Meanwhile, Lithuania's new president called in his inaugural address last week for "tolerance for ethnic minorities and different religions."

Valdas Adamkus, 71, a longtime resident of the United States, left the Baltic country for Germany in 1944. After he was elected in January, reports surfaced in the Russian press that Adamkus fought for the Nazis during World War II.

Adamkus, a Chicago resident from 1949 to 1997, denies the accusations.

IDF nabs arms from Jordan

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Security sources said they are investigating whether the suspected Palestinian gunrunner captured over the weekend attempting to smuggle two boatloads of small arms from Jordan via the Dead Sea was in the service of the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Reserve troops captured the Palestinian late last week, the army said. He had just landed along the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea with two motorized rubber dinghies filled with over 100 weapons and thousands of rounds of ammunition.

Military sources said the cache included 60 Kalashnikov assault rifles, seven shotguns, 38 pistols, ammunition and clips. It was the second time this year that the IDF foiled an attempt to smuggle weapons along this known gun-running route, but IDF officers said the size of the cache was unprecedented.

Students in grades 2 and 5 and United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) write to penpals at Hadassim Child & Youth Village in a program co-sponsored by Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

USDS kids partnered with class in Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Hadassah-WIZO's longtime support of Hadassim, a school for troubled teens near Tel Aviv, has been given a boost by the students of United Synagogue Day School (USDS).

The 1,500 children at the three branches of the school are involved in Kids for Kids Sponsor-a-child, which includes a pen-pal program, raising money and a series of three hike-a-thons.

Each class was partnered with a class at Hadassim, and the students have been corresponding with each other, exchanging letters, pictures and murals, and photographs.

Last week, the youngsters began to raise money. Hadassah president Sharon Kroft explained that for each $36 a class raises, a leaf is added to a special mitzvah tree, which will be a permanent fixture in the school. Every $360 enables a child to be sponsored at Hadassim.

In late May or early June, each campus will go on a hike at a conservation area. "It will not just be an endurance test, but they will learn about nature at the same time," Kroft told The CJN.

The children are very enthusiastic about Kids for Kids. One Grade 7 student is quoted in a media release as saying "It makes me feel proud that I am trying to make a difference for our school and for Hadassim. Anyone will know that it feels great to do this."

Kroft said that the project began because USDS wanted their students to really learn the meaning of tzedakah. Since many mothers (including project co-marketing co-chair Donna Bank) are members of Hadassah, the pairing seemed only natural.

It is also to celebrate the coinciding of Israel's 50th and the 36th anniversary of USDS.

Hadassim opened in 1947 to help children orphaned during World War II. It now serves 1,250, including kids from troubled or problem homes, and largely immigrant children from the surrounding area. There are many who have recently immigrated from Russia and Ethiopia.

Some of the money collected will be given to the Hospital for Sick Children, and to a North York women's shelter.

Unique characters a Purim story highlight

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Purim is a wonderful holiday. We dress up in costumes, eat hamantaschen, have parties, and exchange shalach mones, gifts of food, with our family and friends.

The most important part of the holiday is going to the synagogue, and hearing the reading of the Megillah, the story of Queen Esther, Mordechai, Haman and Achashverosh. Every time we hear the name "Haman," make a lot of noise, so as to blot out even the sound of his name.

You can read the story of Esther as it is retold by Rita Golden Gelman in the book Queen Esther Saves Her People (Scholastic Press, 1998), with illustrations by Frané Lessac.

Gelman explains that "Achashverosh was too busy drinking and eating to bother with thinking."

When his wife, Queen Vashti, refused to appear at his banquet, he had her banished from the kingdom.

Because he was very lonely and bad-tempered, his advisors suggested that he search throughout the kingdom for a queen who would be even more beautiful than Vashti.

Although Mordechai tried to hide Esther, she was finally taken to the palace along with the other girls. Because "her natural beauty ...sparkled and radiated," the king chose her to be his wife.

The book goes on to explain that Haman, the prime minister of Persia, hated Mordechai, because he refused to bow down to him. So he persuaded the king to order that every Jew in the kingdom should be killed.

You know the rest. Esther invites the king and Haman to a banquet, where she declares that she is a Jew, and so would be killed along with all the others. In a rage, the king ordered Haman to be hanged. The Jews were saved.

You will enjoy the entertaining and often funny way Gelman tells the story of Purim. You will especially enjoy the illustrations, full of beautiful, rich colors, and many touches of humor, such as a dog laughing, Haman arguing with his wife, and a lion that on different pages, keeps Achashverosh company, eats Haman's robe, and stands on the palace balcony with Esther and Mordechai, while the king plays ball with a pet dog.

Photographer seizes the moment

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Beverley Abramson catches the crucial instant with an understanding of natural beauty. Running until April 1.

TORONTO — Somewhere near Safed in Israel, a small boy gazes with wonder through sparkles of light at something only he can see. Photographer Beverley Abramson's exhibition Journeys has seized the moment.

Although she has "always carried a camera," Abramson's full-time focus on photography was kindled during an intensive workshop in Paris and Provence offered through a Ryerson Polytechnic University program. A career and education consultant at the University of Toronto for several years, she opted for a change in her own career.

In addition to pursuing further photographic studies she is exploring new directions.

Her current show expresses a fascination with travel. She has taken her camera to Asia, the Middle East, Europe, North and Central America and presents a wide vision from the remote stillness of Scotland's Isle of Skye to the mystique of Israel.

Experience the lure of a lighthouse built circa 1860 at Skye by Robert Stevenson's father and the brilliant flame of an Israeli sunset at Hadera.

See the indigenous umbrella trees of Tuscany, the golden warmth of a harvest field, the caring of a shepherd with his flock.

Go to Arles in France, where sunflowers and scarlet poppies are a fresh, yet poignant reminder of Van Gogh who roamed this same countryside.

Experience Paris from the intimate interiors of expatriate Canadian painter Joe Plaskett's extraordinary house, to the elegant architecture of the Galerie Lafayette.

And peer through the lens at golfer Tiger Woods as he practices for the British Open at Troon.

Abramson's collection reveals a particular strength, the ability to catch the crucial instant with an understanding of natural beauty and human qualities. It is showing at Scaramouche Restaurant, Benvenuto place, until April 1.

In May she will exhibit at Gallery One in Yorkville and in June she mounts a solo show at Holy Blossom Temple.

Sculptor gives pieces a soul

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Ethel Rosenfield (inset) and "Standing Figure."

TORONTO — Ethel Rosenfield 87, a wisp of a woman with a sculptor's firm grip is definitely outspoken.

An aficionado of Henry Moore "the greatest sculptor of our age," she dismisses considerable contemporary sculpture as "so much trash."

This is not to decry abstract or experimental form. In fact she declares, "Everything that is really art is abstract," and she herself carves abstractions, talking without false modesty about their depth and import.

Born in Poland in 1910, she immigrated to Montreal in 1919 and waited until she was over 45 and her children were sufficiently independent before enrolling in night classes at Ecole des Beaux Arts. She studied under Armand Filion and later continued during the day with Louis Archambault.

Driven to make up for lost time, she worked wherever and whenever she could in studios with other sculptors, even, at times, in a freezing garage.

In 1962 she was a co-founder of the Quebec Sculptors' Association. She has lived in Toronto since 1978.

Rising to the arduous physical challenge, Rosenfield works primarily in stone – Indiana limestone, Carrara, Verona and Quebec marble, though she has also used bronze and wood.

Passionately devoted, she creates both rugged, powerful pieces and polished symmetry. Not given to fads, she is direct, honest.

Regularly lighting a cigarette (she is an inveterate smoker) at Beckett Fine Art on Scollard Street following a solo exhibition, she discusses her work.

Comparing painting and sculpture, she stresses that while a picture is one-dimensional, we see a sculpture in its totality. "It has many dimensions. Every time you look, you see something you didn't see before."

Pointing to a sensuous feminine figure in polished Carrara marble with a "hole" in the middle she states, "That is not a hole; it's a space. This piece has life, a soul."

In contrast, Standing Figure, in unpolished Indiana limestone, conveys masculinity, forcefulness.

Family, also limestone, has several components reaching outward yet rooted at the core.

Rosenfield believes it is important for an artist to be consistent, not to jump from one thing to another. Always open however, she maintains that she learns from young people and "they learn from me."

Her work has been shown extensively in Quebec and Ontario as well as at the Rodin Museum in Paris and other venues in Brussels, London and the United States.

Thomas Beckett (Beckett Fine Art Ltd.), now her exclusive agent, affirms, "We're very lucky to have Ethel in Canada," and describes her as a sculptural icon.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

SECOND NOVEL FROM CYNTHIA HOLZ

Bronx-born Cynthia Holz first came to Canada as a correspondent for Business Week, then left journalism so she could focus on writing fiction. She's been a resident of Toronto since 1976.

After two dozen of her stories were published in Canadian magazines, Random House published 10 of the best in Home Again, a short story anthology that appeared in 1989. Numerous stories dealt with Jewish widows or widowers coping with the loss of a partner.

Holz's first novel, Onlyville (Porcupine's Quill Press), the story of a woman's quest for autonomy and understanding, gained critical acclaim in 1994. Now she has just published a second novel, The Other Side.

The Other Side begins when Holly, an actor and housecleaner, comes home from a rendezvous with her married lover to find her gay roommate slumped over the kitchen table, a suicide victim. After the police leave, she discovers that he is still present as a ghost, haunting the kitchen. What follows is an exploration into the lives of two lost souls, with some surprises.

A creative writing instructor at Ryerson Polytechnical University, Holz's writing is known for its immediacy, warmth, vivid images and realism. Paradoxically, even her depiction of a ghost seems realistic, since Marc's limited supernatural abilities are carefully defined; he is not the Shakespearean variety of ghost, ominous and threatening, with vague and sweeping powers. The kitchen is his primary realm.

Published by Second Story Press, The Other Side is available in bookstores for $15.95.

Israelis flock to Air Canada

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV— In less than three years Air Canada has become a major carrier from Israel for businesspeople and tourists visiting Canada and the United States.

The company recently announced that in May it will also introduce a new twice-weekly nonstop service from Montreal to Tel-Aviv, and the Toronto service will be increased to five times a week in April. When the new Montreal service comes into operation, it will mean that Air Canada has a flight to Israel at least once every day of the week.

"We haven't just increased flights," said Ruth Ben-Tzur, Air Canada's general manager in Israel. "We have completely overhauled our reservation and sales service. Up until the end of last year, reservations and sales were handled by a general sales agent, but since January we have handled this ourselves so that the customer service of Air Canada's office here is the same as in any major city in the world that the airline serves."

"There is no doubt that we have put Canada on the map as far as Israelis are concerned," Ben-Tzur said. "Between October 1997 and March 1998, over 4,000 Israelis will have flown to Canada from Tel-Aviv by Air Canada.

This week...

Key West a photo paradise

By JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

Western Union schooner docks after a sunset tour.

KEY WEST — The journey through southern Florida to Key West will take the visitor to one of the most fascinating small cities in North America.

Key West is the southernmost part of the continental United States. It can be reached by driving south on U.S. Highway 1, which runs over a series of bridges connected by several islands known as the Florida Keys.

While many tourists come here to escape the cooler temperatures of the north, Key West, with its fascinating history and local culture, makes the accommodating climate (average 25C) secondary. The town is full of historical sites and has developed a mystique created by many of the town's famous visitors.

The island was discovered by French explorer Ponce de Leon in 1513 and after a series of transfers, it was sold by the Spanish government to businessman John Simonton of Alabama for $2,000.

An American naval base was built on the island in 1823 and Key West has since played a strategic role in American foreign policy in the Caribbean. It was the launching point for the ill-fated Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961.

In 1920, the island became the site of the air passage service from Key West to Havana, Cuba. This same laneway was also the first international airmail route.

Many writers and other celebrities have found inspiration in Key West. Thornton Wilder wrote The Matchmaker here and Richard Bach's 1977 bestseller Illusions was written while the author sat on his boat near Key West.

Perhaps the most famous writers who lived here were Tennessee Williams and Ernest Hemingway. Williams bought a home here in 1949 and it is generally believed he wrote The Glass Menagerie and A Streetcar Named Desire here.

Williams' house is open to tourists. There is also The Tennessee Williams Fine Arts Centre that offers theatre, dance, films and concerts during the winter season. It is located at the Florida Keys Community College.

Hemingway was the island's most famous resident. He wrote 75 percent of his books at his Whitehead Street house including A Farewell to Arms, The Snows of Kilimanjaro and For Whom the Bell Tolls.

Hemingway's house is now a museum that provides daily guided tours. Open to visitors since 1964, the house holds Key West's first swimming pool (built during the '30s for $20,000). Some of the descendants of Hemingway's cats (identified by their six toes) can still be seen around the residence.

The museum allows visitors to see and touch many of the artifacts that the author collected in his travels through Spain, France and Africa.

Fans of Hemingway will enjoy the Hemingway Days Festival in July. In a salute to the famous author, there is a Hemingway look-alike contest, a short story competition, beer drinking at the famous Sloppy Joe's bar, a street fair and a bill fish tournament.

Former U.S. president Harry Truman visited the island 16 times from 1946 until his death. He stayed at a former military housing unit now called The Little White House located at the president's gate to the Key West Naval Station.

There are currently 500 to 600 Jews living here (including at least one expatriot Canadian), according to Rabbi Paul Grob, spiritual leader of the 112-year-old egalitarian Conservative shul. There is also a Lubavitch congregation on the island.

Rabbi Grob is quick to point out the "extreme closeness" between the two congregations, including joint activities for all the holidays and joint minyans. Sometime this month, a kosher grocery store is scheduled to open. The Jewish community of Key West accommodates about 30 to 40 seasonal visitors, Rabbi Grob says.

One cannot forget the famous sunsets of Key West. Almost every evening tourists and residents gather at Mallory Square to watch the sun set where the Gulf of Mexico meets the Atlantic Ocean. It is a picture-taking paradise.

One of the last remaining tall schooners in the world, the Western Union, departs for daytime, sunset and starlight trips most days from Mallory Square.

Accommodation in Key West is plentiful as there are dozens of hotels and motels inside and outside the town. Roosevelt Boulevard offers the security of the most established hotel chains. Cheap to moderately priced accommodation can be found in the Simontown/South Streets area.

Campers will find Boyd's Campground on Highway 1, which accommodates tents and trailers.

The lonely planet in books

Travel refreshes the body, the mind and the soul. The following guidebooks, all published by Lonely Planet and distributed by Raincoast Books, will lead you to vacation destinations bound to stimulate the senses.

If you're casting about for something new in eco travel, look no further than Belize, a pint-sized nation of natural wonders squeezed between Guatemala and Mexico. The New Key to Belize, by Stacy Ritz, fills you in on the tantalizing details.

For a broader perspective of this area, greatly influenced by Mayan culture, read Guatemala, Belize & Yucatan by Tom Brosnahan and Nancy Keller.

With its tropical rainforests, beaches, coral reefs and dormant volcanoes, Costa Rica is a must-see destination. And in Costa Rica, Rob Rachowiecki ticks off the places you should add to your itinerary.

Stretching 4,300 kilometres from the tropics to the Antarctic, Chile is an unusual country, with jungles, icefields and far-flung islands. Chile & Easter Island, by Wayne Bernhardson, makes it come alive.

Ecuador and its ecologically unique possession, the Galapagos Islands, tend to overwhelm even the most jaded of visitors. The New Key to Ecuador and the Galapagos, by David Pearson and David Middleton, provides an excellent overview.

From Egypt to Namibia, Africa is a vast continent, waiting to be discovered. Africa, compiled by 15 writers, is the last, exhaustive word on the subject.

Like Africa, India is extremely diverse. Written by five experts who have meticulously explored this fascinating sub-continent, India is as vital and as saturating as the country itself.

Antarctica, with its eerie landscapes, is probably the most inaccessible land mass in the world, a redoubt of icebergs and a refuge of penguins, whales, seals and birds. In Antarctica, Jeff Rubin explores the loneliest destination on this planet.

Directory targets women

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Instead of giving men the business, two young entrepreneurs have created a directory to help women locate services and products offered by other women.

Launched in Winnipeg a little over a year ago, the directory "is like a yellow pages, but just for women," said Paula Lewis, founder of net-working women, the company that publishes the directory. Her partner, Sherry Warsh, is the company's representative in Toronto and Eastern Canada.

"This directory isn't just for working women," said Warsh. "It's for all women. If you're an entrepreneur or a professional or in the trades or in a retail environment, then you can list in the directory."

So far, the company has published two versions of the directory – a "hard copy," printed booklet and an Internet Web site [www.escape.ca/~womwork] that records over 4,000 "hits" a month. The printed version, containing about 130 listings, is available only in Winnipeg but a Toronto edition is on the drawing boards, slated for distribution sometime in the spring.

The directory has proven extremely popular in the prairie city. When Lewis first distributed it in January 1997, she placed 10,000 copies in high traffic areas like supermarket checkouts, libraries and with women's groups. Within 48 hours, all the store copies were gone and the feedback she received both from clients and readers was positive, she said.

Lewis and Warsh, both 35, believe the directory is an idea who's time has come. Whether as a booklet or on the Internet, it has struck a cord among women who, for a variety of reasons, feel more comfortable doing business with other women.

"There are a lot of women who are successful" who use the directory. Others who find it helpful are "women who are senior citizens who feel vulnerable or are afraid to have a man come in to do some work in their house," Warsh explained.

"Some women who've been sexually abused as children don't want to get medical services from men," Lewis said. "It brings back bad memories."

Others simply enjoy the camaraderie and support they get dealing with other women while some women want to avoid the condescension they've experienced doing business with men. Lewis tells the story of a female lawyer who decided to start her own practice after 10 years in a large law firm. Her banker agreed to open a line of credit for her, but only if she had her father co-sign the loan.

Unhappy with those terms, the woman found a female loan officer at another bank who approved the loan without unreasonable conditions, Lewis said.

Though the company is still new, it's been making money since it started operations, Lewis said.

The directory is available free of charge, with net-working women generating revenue from the sale of advertising space. People who list in the directory are charged $90 a year in Winnipeg, $200 a year in Toronto. The print run in Winnipeg is 10,000 but in Toronto, 50,000 to 60,000 copies are planned.

The listings resemble business cards, with an extra line or two containing a brief description of the services offered. For a larger fee, clients can place a larger, display ad. Lewis reports that 80 percent of the directory's clients renewed their ads after the first year.

Net-working women also publishes a quarterly bulletin that profiles advertisers and it is canvassing its clients to see if they'd consider pooling together to obtain group benefits.

Lewis and Warsh have ambitious goals for net-working women. They have hired two sales associates in Manitoba and plan to expand the company's presence to Vancouver and Calgary. Warsh, a native of Montreal, said the company will hire sales people to canvas the greater Toronto area and the company plans to eventually expand to Ottawa as well.

Currently, Lewis and Warsh operate the company from their homes during their spare time. Lewis has a full-time job as director of operations and special projects at Klinic Community Health Centre and she's the mother of three young children. Warsh, with a background in personnel consulting, has two young children. Both say they do most of their work in the late hours of the night after the kids have been put to bed.

Warsh and Lewis were friends for 11 years before becoming business partners. They met through their husbands, Elliot Goszer and Monty Warsh, who have been friends since childhood.

Objets d'art strong sellers in United States

Sisters rejuvenate ancient art of mosaic

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In her eight years in business, Rebecca Dennis has become adept in the art of tastefully and gently smashing antique porcelain china and ceramic plates to pieces – and putting them back together again to form a unique brand of artwork.

The smash and crash technique adopted by Dennis is the first creative step in the ancient art of mosaic, which Dennis and her sister, Paula Funt, have rejuvenated to create an eye-catching line of furniture and objets d'art.

The stunning creations crafted by the sisters have caught on like wildfire south of the border, which now accounts for 90 percent of their sales.

Their acceptance in the more conservative Canadian market has been slower to develop but in the last two years, their company, Mosaicwares, has expanded beyond their expectations, becoming a large-scale export firm.

Where once the sisters designed, manufactured and sold their own product in cramped quarters on Eglinton Avenue, today they occupy 4,500 square feet in a warehouse, employ 16 workers and send their products all across the United States.

For Dennis, that "overnight" success was eight years in the making and it took the more open-minded American consumer to catch on to the colorful and expressive Mosaicwares designs.

She started the company about eight years ago when she decided to repair a wrought-iron table that she'd received as a gift. The top had broken, so she obtained some tiles, smashed them with a hammer and glued and grouted them to the frame. The reworked table won rave reviews from her friends, so she decided to create more. After she'd finished four tables, she showed them at the Outdoor Art Show, held every July at Toronto City Hall. The response was good so she began adding other items to the line.

Since hardly anyone was doing mosaic work at the time Dennis and her sister, "literally had to invent the techniques to get the patterns out of the china and cut the pieces." They used to hand-break the china and cut out flowers and other motifs.

Through a lot of trial and error, they developed the technique to make products that last and which look appealing. Though mosaic is an ancient art, "we changed it so it's more '90s, more our own history," Dennis said. "You can see a Staffordshire floral piece mixed with a '60s border."

Employing wrought iron bases that are manufactured out-of-shop to Mosaicwares' specification, as well as wooden frames, the final product line includes mosaic-encrusted mirrors, cake stands, end tables, coffee tables, chairs, clocks, plate holders, lamps and a line of Judaica.

Production is highly labor intensive and prices range from $100 for a trivet to $4,300 for an armoire. The average price for a object is in the $400 to $500 range, with a three-tier cake stand their biggest seller.

For years after she started the business, Dennis slogged it out in tiny premises in various locations, increasing annual sales by increments. Her husband, Steven, used to say "'dear, you have to get a real job,'" she recalls.

In their first five or six years in business, the sisters sold modest quantities at art shows and on consignment in small shops. Then, three years ago, they took their show on the road, packing 35 items and renting a booth at the Philadelphia Buyer's Market, a designer show.

The substantial cost of the venture coupled with the intense competition surrounding them made the sisters quite apprehensive. But, "about one hour into the show, our booth was standing room only," Dennis said. By the time they returned to Toronto, they had received $35,000 US in orders from eastern seaboard retailers.

"After the show, we found it difficult in our basement on Eglinton to do everything, so we started to hire people," Dennis said. "Then a beshert thing happened. We got a call from an American woman. She said she was a sales rep in Florida and she'd seen our pieces in a store. Now she's our national sales manager in the United States."

A veteran of the New York shmatte district, Elyse Silver has knocked on a lot of doors in the United States introducing Mosaicwares to the American market.

"We're in Neiman Marcus now," Dennis said with a look approaching astonishment on her face.

Later this month, the sisters will be doing a "PA," a personal appearance at the chain's Ft. Lauderdale store, one of 18 Neiman Marcus outlets that carries their product.

In addition, Henri Bendell, an upscale U.S. department store has picked up their pieces and they continue to seek exposure at high end shows in New York, San Francisco and at the High Point, Atlanta show. Their product is also available in about 10 stores in the Toronto area.

Dennis is too modest to cite specific sales figures. All she'll say is that they're 300 percent higher than when they were on Eglinton and that they send a large shipment south of the border every two weeks.

Neither Dennis or Funt, who studied to be a designer, have formal business training, but together they've done all the firm's purchasing, selling, invoicing, payables, receivables, public relations, customer services and, of course, the gluing and grouting of the pieces.

Dennis believes she developed her business skills by osmosis while working for her father, Harry Berkelhammer, in his company, Manville Lumber. "All the years I worked for my dad, I used to think it was in vain or I wanted to do more with my life. Now I realize that what I took for granted, people go to school to learn about," she said.

"You look back and realize that everything you've done helps," Funt said. "From our dad we learned how to use raw materials and how to work to a plan."

Under their current division of labor, Dennis oversees quality control and public relations while Funt deals with suppliers.

Genetics a factor in onset of colon cancers

To Your Health spoke with Dr. Steven Gallinger, research director of the Steve Atanas Stavro Familial Gastrointestinal Cancer Registry and senior scientist of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital, about recent colon cancer research.

To Your Health

Did you know that after lung cancer, colon cancer is the second leading cause of cancer mortality?

Alarming statistics show that colon cancer will strike approximately one in every 20 Canadians.

Both men and women have an equal chance of developing the disease. More than 80 percent of colon cancer patients are 60 years or older.

At least five to 12 percent of colon cancer cases are thought to be hereditary in nature. Many advances in research have been made on these hereditary types of colon cancer, which typically affect the population at a younger age.

In certain families, the risks of developing colon cancer are passed down from generation to generation, reports Gallinger. The two types of syndromes that fall into this category are Familial Adenomatous Polyposis (FAP) and Hereditary Non-Polyposis Colorectal Cancer (HNPCC). Research efforts have already identified five genes responsible for the development of these diseases.

One of the genes, APC, is the cause of FAP. FAP is responsible for about one percent of all colon cancers. The disease is easy to recognize as patients develop hundreds to thousands of polyps at an early age, usually in their teenage years. The odds are that one in two children of a parent that has FAP will develop the disease.

"With the discovery of the APC gene in 1991, we can predict with almost 100 percent certainty which family members will develop FAP," says Gallinger.

"Those people at risk will be screened through their teenage years and if they develop many polyps, the colon is removed and the risk of developing colon cancer is, therefore, reduced dramatically. If the colon were not removed, these people with the mutated APC gene would, with certainty, develop cancer in their 30s to 40s. In effect, preventive surgery is now based on what the DNA tests tell us."

The more common hereditary cancer, HNPCC, accounts for about five percent of all colon cancers. It is harder to identify these people as they may carry an abnormal gene but the colon is not typically lined with polyps. These people develop colon cancer around age 40, about 25 years younger than the general population.

With the identification of the four genes responsible for HNPCC in 1994, the role of the registry was expanded to serve families affected by the disease. Currently, testing is at a research stage and the registry is focusing on testing for two of the genes. Therefore, even if a test is negative, there is a chance the person may still develop hereditary colon cancer.

"An abnormal gene responsible for HNPCC may be present in about one of every 200 to 1,000 people," says Gallinger. "Studies have shown that about half of the individuals in an HNPCC family have inherited the abnormal gene and many of them will develop colon cancer at a younger age.

"We can now detect this genetic abnormality by DNA testing in the children and relatives of those with hereditary colon cancer. This allows us to monitor high risk individuals and intervene early if precancerous polyps appear."

Similar to FAP, high risk individuals are monitored with a colonoscopy every two years.

However, at this point, their colons are not removed preventively, as with FAP patients. With HNPCC, the colon cancer risk is not as clearly understood, so the treatment is not as straightforward.

"If we prevent colon cancer in high-risk families, we will help hundreds of people. Yet, the greater challenge is to prevent cancer in the general population. We are targeting the high risk groups because we understand the genetics much better and we may be able to apply what we learn to the general population.

"For example, the gene that causes FAP, the APC gene, is very important in the development of all forms of colon cancer. A great deal has been learned about colon cancer by studying the APC gene. If we know precisely what APC does and if perhaps we find a way of putting the gene or APC protein back into the cells that have lost functional APC, then we have a chance of preventing colon cancer in everybody, not just in FAP."

According to Gallinger, it is inevitable that more genes will be found that cause hereditary cancer. In addition, the technology for genetic testing will improve to the point where it is cheaper, easier and more accurate. Genetic analysis that is currently done by manual techniques will be automated.

Also, scientists are starting to explore what colon cancer genes do and why individuals are at high risk when carrying these abnormal genes. Once the normal function of these genes is known, drugs will eventually be developed that can restore their function, and ultimately prevent cancer.

Dealing with grief and loss

TORONTO — Social worker Anne Brener, a specialist on dealing with loss and grief, will give the Marsha Goldstein Quiles Yahrtzeit shiur on March 22. She will be discussing practical and spiritual strategies for coping with bereavement through Jewish tools of healing and transformation.

Her lecture is sponsored by Kolel: a centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, Bereaved Jewish Families and B'nai Brith Canada.

Brener will also hold a special workshop for professionals in the mental health, psychology and social work fields, on creating rituals for mourning: therapeutic tools, on March 23, 9 a.m. to 12:30 p.m., at the Lipa Green Building. That event is sponsored by Kolel and by Jewish Hospice. Cost is $40.

On March 25, psychotherapists and educators Dr. Elaine Cooper and Alenna Strauss will lead an experiential follow-up workshop for those who have experienced loss. Small group discussions will include Judaic text study and meditation.

Enrolment is limited, and by pre-registration only. Cost is $20. Call for the location.

BATTER UP

The boys of summer are gearing up for another baseball season, including Toronto Blue Jays outfielder Shawn Green. With a new manager running the team, it's expected Green will be a key man in the Jays' lineup this year.

Canada's hockey not golden

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Who'd have believed it? That Canada's pride and joy, the men's hockey "dream team," would come home from Nagano with as many medals as the Israeli figure skating squad.

Breakfast club sports mavens from Richmond Hill, Ont., to Richmond, B.C., who watched with pride as the Israelis competed on the world stage, couldn't shake the realization that our hockey players weren't good enough. That the world will never be the same again. That a monumental tragedy had befallen Canada.

Opinion

C'mon Canada, get over it. Despite Canada's disappointing fourth place showing, the sun still rose the next morning and life went on.

Don Cherry notwithstanding, Canada's showing was neither a disaster nor a tragedy, but simply a reminder that in the world of hockey, there are a lot of teams as good as Canada's. Commentators are concluding that Canada will never again be a dominant player in international hockey unless we start to stress skills and skating at an early age.

But I'll go even farther than that. In my humble opinion, we never were as great as we thought we were and we're not as bad as we currently think we are. There's plenty of hockey history to back that up.

Think back to all those glorious Canadian victories in the past 26 years. In 1972, we iced a team of top professionals and barely, just barely, eked out a series win over our arch rivals, the Soviet Union. It took a last-minute goal in the last game to permit Canada to claim hockey supremacy.

In 1976, at the first Canada Cup, the best Canadian team ever was head and shoulders above the rest of the competition and won fairly handily. But in the subsequent Challenge Cup and in the 1991 Canada Cup, Canada lost fairly handily.

At the next Canada Cups in 1984 and 1987, it took the combined efforts of Canada's very best skaters at the peak of their careers – Gretzky, Bossy, Tonelli, Coffey, Messier and Lemieux – to beat the Soviets, and then only by the skin of our teeth. Don't forget, Canada didn't romp over the opposition in either of those tourneys. In '84 we won in overtime and in '87, it took Gretzky and Lemieux at their best to sink the Soviets late in the series' last game.

Canada won the 1991 Canada Cup without too much opposition, but in 1996, the Americans rode hot goaltending to a win over Canada. And don't forget that Canada was lucky to beat the Swedes in the semi-final.

In all, Canada's international hockey record has been mixed.

Looking at Nagano prior to the games, an objective observer not caught up in the excitement of the Canadian dream team might have suggested it would take our best playing their best to win gold. In Nagano, a number of factors kept the Canucks from being their best.

Clearly, the loss of Paul Kariya was a major setback in a tournament in which the top teams were so evenly matched. There were no soft touches among the top six teams, so any edge would have helped. Coupled with the loss of Joe Sakic, arguably one of Canada's top three forwards along with Kariya and Eric Lindros, Canada was behind the eight ball right from the opening faceoff of the game against the Czech Republic.

Many Canadians, this one included, believed there was enough offensive talent on the bench to pressure and beat the Czechs despite those setbacks, but another factor entered into play to hamper the Canadian effort.

The enormous expectations placed on the shoulders of our professionals cost them at least a period of good hockey in that key game against the Czechs. Sure the Czechs were good, but have you ever seen a group of experienced skaters as tight and tentative as Canada was in the first period against the Czech Republic? It seemed that no one could give or take a pass, stickhandle or win a race for the puck. The Czechs, on the other hand were much looser.

Canada improved as the game went on and late in the game and in overtime carried the play, while the Czechs played tough defence throughout, lined up on their own blueline, forced the Canadians to shoot the puck deep, held on and relied on Dominik Hasek in a shootout. It was a winning strategy.

At the other end of the ice, Canadian coach Marc Crawford and his staff erred in several respects, I believe. Not only did they not get the team loose and ready to play that opening period, their game decisions left a lot to be desired In that Czech game and in others, Crawford should have shortened his bench much earlier.

Some of the Canadians never adjusted to the big ice and they should have been left sitting at the end of the bench. Brendan Shanahan, a great player in the NHL, was a bust in Nagano, and can anyone point to the positive playoff contributions made by Theo Fleury, Rod Brind'amour, Scott Stevens, Eric Desjardins, Shayne Corson, Al MacInnis, Steve Yzerman or Joe Nieuwendyk?

Crawford should have done like the Czechs and double-shifted his more effective players – Lindros, Gretzky, Primeau, Linden, Recchi. Great players get better when they get lots of ice time and if Lindros and Primeau were Canada's best forwards, why were they playing only one shift out of four?

Crawford should also take some heat from a decision in the bronze medal game against Finland for his power play setup when Canada had a two-man advantage for almost two minutes. For the first half of the penalty, he failed to send out a big man to screen the Finnish goaltender. In the Czech game, where were the big Canadian forwards when it came to screening Hasek? So many 200-pounders and so little drive to the net.

It was disturbing that in many aspects of the game, Canada was outplayed. Canada's vaunted forecheck was spotty in coming up with the puck; we lost a lot of physical battles for the puck; despite our high-priced talent, we were inept in carrying the puck over the opposition blueline. Still, the Czechs deserve a lot of credit for their tight defensive style that also forced the supposedly more skilled Russians to dump and chase in the gold medal game.

More was expected of our Olympians, but the reality is that the Czech Republic, Russia, Finland, Canada, Sweden and the United States are now so evenly matched, it will take all our top players playing at their very best for Canada to win.

Entering a tournament without carrying the weight of the Canadian national psyche on their shoulders should help our pros play up to their abilities. It's time we realized that in the brave new world of international hockey, we're not first among equals, but instead one of six nations that will take turns sharing that honor.

The Inside Back

Property owning problems

By JONATHAN SHIFF

As anybody who has bought real estate in Israel knows, the procedure can be confusing and mystifying. One of the factors that complicates matters so much is the question of ownership.

Most of the land in Israel is owned either by the government or by quasi-governmental bodies such as the Jewish National Fund. This means that in most places, the purchaser doesn't actually end up owning the land, but in fact leases it from the government for 49-year periods at a time. This is safe and reliable, and most residential leases are automatically renewed.

Much of the land in Jerusalem, however, has an additional quirk: vast tracts of property in some of the best neighborhoods are actually owned by various churches.

One particularly problematic case is in the popular and expensive Jerusalem neighborhood of Rehavia. Built in the early part of the century, its charming streets and boulevards are favored by native Israelis and foreign investors alike.

One interesting complex of buildings was built in the 1930s on land owned by The Superior Father of the Fathers of Notre Dame de Sion. The company that built the buildings leased the land from the church. The lease runs out in 2034.

While 2034 might seem a long way off, in real estate terms the end of the lease is already looming and the uncertainty has drastically driven down the value of the apartments in what is otherwise an expensive part of town.

Since the Rehavia property is the first such lease scheduled to come up, many people involved in real estate will be watching carefully to see what happens. There are several possible scenarios:

Presumably, the church will want to either extend the leases or kick out the tenants. The latter option seems less likely, because it will be more expensive and will also lead to some kind of intervention, as both the government and the courts will be loath to allow hundreds or thousands of mostly elderly people to lose their homes.

Furthermore it is worth noting that by at least one estimate, the price paid by the original leaseholders in the mid-1930s was equal to the value of the land, so that in effect they purchased the land outright.

If the church agrees to extend the lease, it will want to charge rental payments. These could be quite expensive, given the location and value of the land, but charging too much will tempt the Knesset or the courts to intervene.

On the one hand, it will be hard for judges and legislators to make a case for intervention, since the purchasers knew what they were getting into and contracts must be honored. At the same time, it will be hard to stand by and not try and fix the terrible mess the situation could create. In England, for example, the Parliament forced churches to transfer land to the leaseholders.

For the courts, this may be a no-win situation: there is no legal basis to harm the owners' property rightsby extending contracts which have ended; and state involvement (i.e. expropriation, forcing the churches to extend leases) could have disastrous effects on the perception of Israel as a place that encourages investment and permits the market to work freely. There is also an issue of Israel's relationship with the world's churches.

Nonetheless, there will be great political pressure to prevent a situation where the churches take advantage of a 100-year-old agreement to present people with the false choice of either losing their homes or their money.

Whatever happens in Rehavia will likely be a precedent for many other properties in Jerusalem. For the legal profession it provides a fascinating study. For the potential investor it contains pitfalls, and such issues must be examined thoroughly before a purchase is made. It is therefore worth remembering that, if the three criteria around the world when it comes to real estate are "location, location, location," in Israel this should be replaced with "location, location, registration."

Purim Recipe

1/4 cup butter or margarine, softened
2 large eggs, separated
1 1/3 cups all purpose white flour
1/8 tsp. cream of tartar
1 cup poppy seeds
1/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 1/2 tsps. baking powder
2/3 cup packed brown sugar

Grind seeds in blender until most are broken up. Set aside. In medium bowl at medium speed, cream butter with sugar; mix in egg yolks and vanilla. Add flour, baking powder and mix well until combined and crumbly. Firmly press crumbs into greased 9" square baking pan. Set aside.

In clean bowl with clean beaters, beat egg whites with cream of tartar until frothy. Gradually add brown sugar until stiff peaks form, then fold in poppy seeds. Evenly spread meringue mixture over dough in the pan. Bake in preheated 350°F oven 30 minutes, or until top is set and very lightly browned. Cool completely in pan on wire rack. When cool, cut into 4 large squares, then diagonally cut each square into 4 triangles.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Stan and I have been dating for 3 months now. He's a sweet guy and although he is between jobs, we've actually started talking about a future together.

We are still in the process of learning about each other. There are, however, some things he does, particularly one that I'm not sure I know how to handle.

He has an unusual jealous streak. But it is not evident when I speak to or look at other men.

The other evening we were going out. When I dressed, I wore a beautiful broach that I received as a birthday gift from an old boyfriend. Stan commented on the broach and when I innocently offered the information of where it came from, he said if I ever put that thing on again he would not go out with me.

The comment blew me away. I took off the broach, but haven't been able to stop thinking about this incident.

Do you find this strange?

Lose the Broach

Dear Lose the Broach

It sounds like Stan has some demons to battle.

One possiblity is his insecurity in being out of work. He might be wishing that he too could buy you beautiful jewelry and he may feel inferior at this particular moment in his life.

You say he has never shown signs of jealousy before this episode. You were right not to antagonize him at that moment by insisting on wearing the broach; however, this is a subject that should not be put away forever, especially if you're planning a future together. It needs to be talked out.

Let some time pass and if possible, maybe even wait until he has found another job.

When you feel the time is right, bring up the broach incident. Let him know that you wore it simply because it was a nice broach and not because it brought back memories of your old boyfriend. See if his outburst was truly triggered by his insecurity about a previous relationship you had, or a problem he has with pride and the inability to be able to afford to buy you a beautiful gift too.

In the meantime don't stir the pot. When you go out with Stan, leave the broach at home. It is obviously very uncomfortable for him and until the two of you can talk it out, it's best left out of the picture.

Jewish groups slam report

Immigration and refugee proposals widely condemned

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Immigrant and Jewish groups have slammed sweeping reforms proposed to Canada's refugee and immigration systems as everything from cold-hearted to outright racist.

Immigrant advocates fear the recommendations could lead to a new closed-door immigration and refugee policy for Canada.

Mainly, they fear the recommendation – one of 172 – that newcomers be required to speak English or French. It's a provision groups say would have prevented thousands of now-successful Canadians from coming to this country.

Jewish groups are also upset with possible new restrictions on family reunification and refugee claims.

Recommendations in a report commissioned by Ottawa seem motivated by a desire to restrict the number of immigrants and refugees allowed into the country, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) told public hearings in Toronto last week.

The proposals should be shelved because they are unfair, hypocritical and mean-spirited, BBC says. But the Quebec branch of Jewish Immigrants Aid Services (JIAS) and Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, in their joint appearance at the hearings in Montreal, sounded a much more conciliatory tone, praising parts of the report.

FLOWERS FOR THOSE WHOSE GRAVES ARE UNKNOWN
An unidentified woman lays flowers on the symbolic tombstones of relatives during a remembrance ceremony for fallen Israeli soldiers whose burial places are unknown. Memory's resolute grip

Editorial

There is a common theme in the two pictures on this page, which even their total contrast in subject, presentation, color and mood cannot suppress or hide. That theme, of course, is the elevation of human memory as the key instrument of Jewish survival.

The unidentified older woman pays homage to a fallen relative on the occasion of the memory of the death of Moses some 3,500 years ago. The colorful stylization by 10-year-old Deena Markus of the clown dutifully bidding us to have a Happy Purim is also a rendering of homage, through memory, to the vanquishing of a tyrant intent on destroying a diaspora Jewish community, which took place some 2,500 years ago.

The unidentified older woman in Israel and young Deena Markus in Canada are joined by a straight line of peoplehood held tight on either side by the resolute grip of divinely inspired, commonly shared memory. To all the readers of The CJN, we convey our wishes for a happy, healthy Purim.

Shabbat Dinner Guest

"We need to talk and the Common Sense way to do so is over a friendly meal," said the gregarious mayor.

The premier's office seemed pleased with the invitation. It issued the following statement: "The premier is happy to eat at the furniture salesman's home any time, but especially so on Shabbat, knowing business will not be discussed."

Dinner's Over

TORONTO — Jewish officials from around Canada have agreed to end the practice of serving expensive dinners at honoree functions. From now on it will simply be coffee and donuts, with the occasional croissant thrown in.

Consulting the Bible

OTTAWA — In an attempt to explain the freak weather patterns which recently battered Quebec and eastern Ontario, meteorologists are now turning to the Bible.

According to one federalist weather forecaster, the bad weather is a sign that the Almighty is becoming perturbed by the growing political separatist rumblings in Quebec.

Premier Lucien Bouchard's office said the reports were proof that Ottawa is getting desperate. The premier told Quebecers that if Quebec were a sovereign state it would not be subject to these adverse weather patterns.

Food For Thought

OTTAWA — Finance Minister Paul Martin today urged Canadians to start saving old scraps of food to use as future savings vehicles.

The message came following a recent auction of the memorabilia belonging to the late Duke and Dutchess of Windsor. Among the items sold was a piece of wedding cake which fetched $26,000.

Martin said that by saving a few morsals here and there, Canadians could put away a tidy nest egg by the time of their retirment. He denied that the plan was a move to eventually end the Canadian Pension Plan.

Niceness Awards

VANCOUVER — The Jewish community last week launched a new award for Nice Jewish people.

The community is planning a celebration to celebrate the award, which will be highlighted with an outdoor arts festival.

Premier Lucien Bouchard of Quebec was outraged, saying that his province also has nice Jewish people.

Chaos at Airport

TORONTO — Police were called to Pearson International Airport yesterday to quell a disturbance surrounding the abrupt departure of Israeli Rabbi Pinchas Leib Obergegessen from Toronto.

A spokesperson said that they had gotten a tip that the rabbi would be surrounded by a large group of people seeing him off, although it was unclear whether they would be there to wish him well or to make sure he got on the plane.

Grasshopper Pie

TORONTO — The Vaad Hakashruth has organized a committee to determine what species of grasshopper are actually kosher, and what method of shchitah would be appropriate.

It's My Deli

MONTREAL — Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard today admitted that if Montreal really wanted to stay in Canada, he would have no option but to let them go. However, he stressed, that Schwartz's Deli would have to stay in a sovereign Quebec, as he swears by the food.

Constitutional experts were left puzzled however, wondering how they would cordon off the deli from the rest of the city.

Wrong Size

MONTREAL — Quebec scientists have determined a way to shrink people to the size of an ant.

While there is yet no commercial value to this new procedure, the province's language police immediately said they would investigate to ensure that any signs reduced to microscopic proportions still comply with the law.

"French language atom-size signs must still be twice as big as English language atom-size signs," said one official.

Saddam for Lunch

TORONTO — Ontario Premier Harris has invited Saddam Hussein to a working lunch in an effort to share information on common problems with teachers, health care workers, unions, property taxes, education, welfare and casinos.

Lemech-Files

JERUSALEM — In an effort to put the entire conversion issue to rest, the Likud government has called upon the famed Lemech-Files investigators.

"The truth is out there," said the prime minister, "and we will find it if it takes 1,000 years."

Politically Incorrect

JERUSALEM — Radical feminists last week stormed the offices of the Weizmann Institute demanding that the name of the institution be changed.

Protesters brandished banners demanding that the name of the institution be changed to the Weizperson Institute.

A Lot of Naches

JERUSALEM — The Naches party last week announced that it would be fielding a slate of candidates in the next Israeli elections.

According to documents filed in the Knesset, the party's central platform advocates Naches for everyone.

The party's sage scholars have recently demanded that the government enact legislation imposing child quotas for all Jewish couples.

"Couples should have at least one child a year, maybe more," said Rabbi Farfetched. "You can never kvell enough."

UJA Federation takes over Leafs/Raptors

By JEFF ROSEN
News Editor

TORONTO — In a move that is expected to stun the sports world and have lasting repercussions in the Jewish community for years to come, it was announced that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto would be taking control of the Toronto Maple Leafs and the Toronto Raptors.

In a media briefing held on the concourse level of Union Station, sports mogul Steve Stavro announced that he was turning control of his prize winning teams over to Leafs' partner, Larry Tanenbaum, who was recently named chair of the Israel at 50 campaign.

The deal also allows Tanenbaum to select a new arena site for the Leafs and the Raptors.

In a breathtaking revelation to the media gathering, Tanenbaum added that the federation will quickly move on plans to relocate the Leafs and the Raptors to a new home in the soon-to-be-renovated Bathurst Jewish Centre/Lipa Green complex.

While he expects that some area residents will oppose the increased traffic the new facility will bring, he said he has received assurances from Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman that there will be no problems in the rezoning process.

Reached on the beach in windswept Florida, the Mayor of Everything He Sees said, "The way I see it, the Jewish community can erect traffic controls on Bathurst Street from Wilson to Steeles."

Lastman denied rumors that he would be receiving lifetime season's tickets for the Leafs or Raptors. However, he said he would not be insulted if the community wanted to name the new arena in his honor.

The mayor's political ally, Howard Moscoe, agreed with Lastman, saying that in addition to traffic controls, he would be pressing the TTC to build a new subway line right to the facility's front door.

Unnamed sources have reported that as part of the deal, Stavro received exclusive shopping rights within a 25 mile radius of the new sports facility. He was also promised that every Jewish organization in the Greater Toronto Area would name him as their guest of honor at one of their dinners sometime in the next five years.

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) officials expressed shock and outrage that they weren't consulted on the plans. It is believed that the organization is launching a fact-finding mission to Maple Leaf Gardens to explore whether anti-Semitism played any part in Stavro's decision to sell his interests to the federation, as opposed to BBC.

As for the fate of the Air Canada Centre, title to which the Jewish community will also be given as part of the deal, Tanenbaum said an unnamed Israeli airline has already stepped forward, and the nearly completed arena will soon be renamed the El Al Centre.

He denied rumors that the Mossad would have a secret operations room on the premises of the centre. The new sports giant did confirm rumors, however, that the federation is currently talking with the directors of The Canadian Jewish News to relocate the newspaper to the El Al Centre.

The CJN's general manager Gary Laforet said the move would finally allow the paper room to grow and ensure proper space on the hardwood floor of the basketball court for the production department to spread out.

The paper's editor also praised the move, saying that "such a wonderful facility would better enable the editorial staff to get in touch with their feelings."

When contacted in his home in Quebec City, Premier Lucien Bouchard said that Montreal's Jewish community should regard the move as insulting and humiliating and that such an indignity would not have occurred if Quebec were a sovereign nation.

How Mike saved Canada

The boy was born to golf. He could not remember the very first time he walked onto a golf course; nor could he remember when he had not been on a golf course.

For him, the golf course was the most perfect place to be, where space and time converged into one great harmony of expanse, color, movement and sanctuary. He could look as far as possible into any horizon and see all around him the exquisite partnership between man and nature.

From a very young age, tagging along with his father, when he first discovered the velvety green spaces alongside the rough, untended forests, the golf course became his favorite playground. It was where he felt totally free, unencumbered by the thousands of intrusive, irritating decisions that were part of every hour of every day.

At school, for example, he always felt uncomfortable, trapped by the teachers' constant harping demands to answer questions and to find the main points in every ridiculous, boring lesson.

At home, he felt the same way, weighed down by the permanent millstone of conversation and responsibility: always having to choose just the right thing to say and the right thing to do.

He was stymied by what he called the mental maze of so many decisions, unable to see a clear way forward; unable, as well, to find his way back.

Thus, most of the time he simply refused to make decisions, to find answers, or to ask questions.

But this only infuriated his teachers, his friends and his family. Mistaking his sincere inability for a streak of irremedial stubbornness, everybody, in turn, would urge him, even yell at him to make up his mind.

"Decide. Say something, anything. Choose an answer, any answer," his geography teacher would scream. "Sure it's a gamble, but so what! All of life is a gamble."

"All of life is a gamble." The phrase stuck with him from early childhood through adolescence into adulthood.

Whenever he found himself in a situation that called for a decision, which was every day, a hundred times a day, his old geography teacher's advice roared back at him like the words of the national anthem.

"All of life is a gamble."

It became his holy text, guiding him through the heavy traffic of decision-making like a seeing-eye dog:

"All of life is a gamble."

Except on the golf course, where he felt liberated from even the tiniest decision. Unlike other golfers who puzzled at the selection of the right club or labored at just the precise measure of muscle in a swing, Mike was a natural. He didn't think about the mechanics of golf. He never second-guessed himself on the course. He just played.

And he played beautifully.

His golfing reputation spread throughout the Nipissing region that was his home. He was known as Masterstroke Mike.

Eventually, Mike's notoriety as a golfer led him into public life. He ran for election and after a handful of years, won his way up the political ladder to the very top rung: Premier Mike Harrison.

He won the leadership of the party with a brilliant proposal that came to him one night in a dream like a sudden burst of white hot lightning across a summertime Nipissing sky. He dreamt his old geography teacher was yelling at him in front of the whole class: "Decide, already. Gamble, Mike. Life is one big gamble, anyway."

Casinos! He promised to build a casino in every major community of the province. To ensure that the people would have enough money to lose at the casinos, he promised a 30 percent reduction in their taxes.

Some years later, as events unfolded without their usual predictability, history called upon Masterstroke Mike in a very significant way.

Livid Lucien, the perpetually angry premier of Quebec, devised yet another crafty and diabolical scheme to dismantle the country. He challenged anyone to step forward from among the lackey federalist leaders to play a round of golf to determine whether Quebec would stay in Canada. Having failed for the 10th time in 20 years to win a referendum on separation, he was desperate. But he also knew that Canadians were so exhausted, so irritated and so totally fed up with the constant nail-biting, high-wire tension of endless referenda, they would accept the challenge.

He was right. Canadians did.

Not surprisingly, they chose Masterstroke Mike as their champion. The country was nervous though because Livid Lucien was a good golfer himself. He was known to be without equal at teeing off on others.

But the country's nervousness proved to be for naught. Livid Lucien was no match for the golfer from the Nipissing. Lucien was better than Mike at teeing off. But he was a much lesser person in the straight, fairway. And on the exposed, uncluttered green, he was particularly ineffective whereas Mike was a virtual magician, able to sense every contour and change in nuance in the lie of the grass. His putter was like a divining rod, miraculously directing the ball into each hole. Lucien could only watch, disbelieving and humiliated.

The country was saved.

That night Mike went to bed very happy, the adulation of all the people still singing in his ear: "The putts, the putts, did you see the putts!"

Fisch fight matchmaker

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gleeda Snow-Cohen, a practising matchmaker for two decades, is being sued by feuding machatonim.

Doug Fisch and his wife Pellafon Whyte, along with Midbar Fry and his wife Desdemona Fisch (no relation to Doug), agree on one thing only. The two couples rue the day Snow-Cohen introduced their children in 1995.

They claim that Snow-Cohen brought together their children, Zeke Whyte-Fisch and Alonnette Fisch-Fry, knowing of their divergent political views and religious practices.

Snow-Cohen advised them not to discuss religion, politics or Israel on their first date, alleges Doug Fisch.

Ironically, the young couple turned out to have much in common. Fisch-Fry had been involved for several years in behind-the-scenes work for Canadian Friends of Peace-at-Any-Price; Whyte-Fisch had volunteered in a similar capacity for The Canadian Keep-Every-Inch-of-Land-Whatever-the-Cost Society.

Their parents are founding members and past presidents of the respective organizations. Coincidentally, Fry and Whyte created the secret handshakes used by their respective cohorts.

From a religious standpoint, Fisch-Fry and Whyte-Fisch were both raised Conservative. Fisch-Fry, however, grew up in an egalitarian congregation, and Whyte-Fisch was a card-carrying member of the Toronto chapter of Orange-Free Seder Plates.

(Oranges began appearing on the seder plates of Jewish feminists a few years ago following a male rabbi's statement that "a woman belongs on the bimah just like an orange belongs on the Seder plate.")

So on their first date Fisch-Fry and Whyte-Fisch eschewed conversation about the subjects on which they had expounded hundreds of times. Instead they discussed values, their pets, the dating scene, childhood memories and qualities of an ideal matchmaker.

"We ended up talking for seven hours," Whyte-Fisch told The CJN. "By then, I was hooked."

"Me too," confessed Fisch-Fry. "We realized how much we had in common."

Within weeks, Fisch-Fry and Whyte-Fisch had renounced all ties to the organizations begun by their parents. They started a new organization, School of Fisch (SOF), to promote Jewish unity. (See CJN Education Supplement, Feb. 31).

SOF is "the organization to end all organizations," they said.

Late last year, Fisch-Fry and Whyte-Fisch were married in a low-key ceremony their parents refused to attend.

Fisch, Whyte, Fry and Fisch are suing Snow-Cohen for $7 million, charging alienation of filial affection and interference with the continuity of the Jewish people.

"That Snow-Cohen woman is a cold fish if I ever saw one," said Whyte.

"Thanks to her, Israel is doomed," said Fry. "We are – were – the largest and most influential chapter in the world of Peace-at-Any-Price. Now our younger members are defecting and following Alonnette's lead. We are shocked and appalled."

"Israel was doomed when you were active," a scornful Doug Fisch told his macheteniste. "But now it's even more doomed. The same thing that happened to your organization is happening in The Canadian Keep-Every-Inch-of-Land-Whatever-the-Cost Society. Our young leaders – the people we thought were our young leaders – are following Zeke. Israel is doomed. Society is doomed. We are doomed."

"Who the heck are these gloom-and-doom people, and what are they carrying on about?" asked Susan Jackson, director of continuity programming, UJA Federation. "Now," she sighed, "I guess I'll have to revise my speech about the Food Jews."

With apologies to Jackson, whose "Food Jews" story is worth hearing.

Rabbis rule on kashrut of donuts

By BADANA PANZER
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Only yeast donuts are kosher, according to a ruling made yesterday by a special committee of the Fervently Frum Fraternity of Rabbis (FFFR).

"Yeast donuts fulfil the strictest requirements of kashrut, as set out in the tractate of Talmud Baba Sufganiot, which deals solely with donuts," explained committee chair Rabbi Leibish Glatt-Mehadrin.

"They are perfectly round, symbolizing the universality of Torah principles, sweet, like Torah learning, and soft, symbolizing the total compassion and love those on our level of observance have for all other Jews," he said.

"Those who can't accept this ruling are miserable oisgeworfs who have no right to consider themselves part of the Jewish people," he noted.

Reaction from supporters of cake and filled donuts was quick and hostile.

"Cake donuts fulfil all the halachic requirements," snapped Rabbi Kyle Glazer, spokesman for The Traditional Rabbinic Organization (TRO). "They are round, and they have holes. The only difference is that their texture makes them appropriate for the end of the 20th century.

"You don't have to keep everything as it was 500 years ago to be halachic," he concluded.

Rabbi Gillian Leavenstein, on behalf of RMRC, the Really Modern Rabbinic Council, called the decision "reactionary."

"Filled donuts are just as indicative of the essence of Torah as yeast ones are," she said. "We must not let the constraints of outdated ideas dictate our lives."

A committee of the Knesset struck to deal with the thorny issue, was unable to come up with a compromise acceptable to all three organizations.

"Why don't Israelis just stick to falafel, and not be seduced by this North American junk?" its final report asked.

The issue was further complicated by a dispute between the FFFR and the Sruga Coalition, led by Rabbi Shlomo Horowitz.

The FFFR, citing posek 15 in Baba Sufganiot, has said that holes in donuts must be 1.5 cm. in diameter. The Sruga Coalition, however, responded that it doesn't matter how wide the hole is, so long as it is there.

The two Orthodox organizations have also clashed over the permissibility of eating the donut tidbits, the FFFR asserting that tidbits are in the same category as cake or filled donuts ("aberrations," said Rabbi Glatt-Mehadrin), while the Sruga Coalition said that they are willing to work with the TRO and the RMRC to find a mutually acceptable tidbit.

The situation is not wholly negative, however. The dispute has resulted in a huge surplus of unsold donuts, which have become stale. Representatives of Neturei Karta have said they are suitable for throwing at motorists on Bar Ilan Street on Shabbat, even if they are not strictly kosher, and representatives of the munitions industry have said that being able to use stale donuts as ammunition in their anti-missile weapons has done much to improve their economic status.

Some bloopers of biblical proportions written by young students:
- The First Commandment was when Eve told Adam to eat the apple.
- The Fifth Commandment is humor thy mother and father.
- The greatest miracle in the Bible is when Joshua told his son to stand still and he obeyed him.

Donut ruling really angers Toronto Jews

By BADANA PANZER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is great consternation in Toronto's Jewish community over the recent declaration by a visiting Israeli rabbi that the kashrut requirements for the donut are inadequate, and do not reflect the decisions of the Fervently Frum Fraternity of Rabbis.

Rabbi Pinchas Yehuda Leib Obergegessen, who last year caused pandemonium by declaring the entire city treif, made his most recent decision on a visit to celebrate the engagement of his follower Shmuel Levi Moishe Hobnishkeinparnossah to Torontonian Faige Hinda Baila Tattahotgelt.

In an interview with The CJN, Rabbi Obbergegessen said he was following the halachic ruling of the rabbinical sages in Israel, that only yeast donuts are kosher, as opposed to cake donuts or filled donuts which, they have decided, are treif.

"Here in Toronto, not only are the other two kinds considered kosher, but donut shops supposedly under strict rabbinic supervision display them on the same shelves (although admittedly not usually in the same bins).

"Consumers who don't know the Halachah think they are equal," he thundered.

For one of the few times in recent history, all the rabbinical organizations in the city are in agreement in their reaction — well, almost.

The Torah-True Rabbinical Council and the GTA and Hinterland Board of Rabbis, in a joint communique, suggested that Rabbi Obergeggesen return to Israel immediately, if not sooner.

"We are quite capable of creating our own tsuris, without help from Israel," the communique said.

Elvis, his blue suede suit and other true stories

By JORDAN MAX

Deep Blue Re-assigned
JERUSALEM — Fresh from its defeat of Grand Chess Master Gary Kasparov, IBM announced that its Deep Blue SuperComputer will be brought out of retirement, renamed Deep Blue and White. It will be reprogrammed to analyze the Middle East Peace Process, at a rate of 200 million permutations per second, and to devise permanent solutions which have continued to elude Israel, the Palestinian Authority and Arab neighbors. As part of the deal struck with the government coalition, IBM has also programmed Deep Blue and White to randomly threaten to leave the coalition and go on strike for indeterminate periods of time.

Fluke or Advent of Mashiach?
TORONTO — In a rare occurance that scientists estimate only happens once every two million years, all congregants attending their synagogues last Shabbat were found to be in total agreement with their respective Rabbis' sermons. While some authorities predicted this represented the advent of the coming of the Mashiach, the Skeptics' Association downplayed the event as a mere fluke.

Jewish Unity?
TORONTO — Citing irreconcilable differences of opinion, six major Jewish communal organizations announced last week that they would each be forming their own Task Forces on Jewish Unity.

A Yiddisheh Elvis?
Memphis, Tennessee — On the 20th anniversary of Elvis Presley's death comes a fascinating discovery of a previously unheard of record album the rock legend apparently cut in his youth, in honor of his bubbie's 80th birthday. While it is known that Elvis had a Jewish grandmother, the album discovery has shocked the Elvis revivalist movement worldwide. The songs on the album include a jazzed up version of My Yiddisheh Mama and numerous other songs in Yiddish, his apparent mamelashon. More startling, however, was the discovery of original songs such as Beis Medresh Shockle, Don't Press My Blue Suede Suit and Rib Steak, Tender which musicologists now believe were the precursors for his other famous hits. A farbrengen in the Grand Ole Opry in Nashville is being planned for his next yahrzeit.

More Gambling Venues
TORONTO — The Provincial government announced that it will be introducing a new gaming table at its Neighborhood Casinos around the province, which are to be housed in hospitals and nuclear generating stations closed last year. Apparently based on betting on the results of a four sided spinning top, the dreidel booth is expected to draw reluctant Jewish gamblers to the casinos.

Solution found to future floods
WINNIPEG — Citing last year's record flood of the century, Emergency Preparations Canada has made plans to purchase and stockpile all world supplies of unsold matzah. In the event of a massive spring flood recurring, the plan is to air drop matzot on rising flood waters. Previous scientific studies have found that matzah is capable of absorbing up to 10,000 times its weight in water. Clean-up plans involve building the world's largest matzah ball as a monument and tourist attraction.

Ice Storm Tsurris
MONTREAL — As exhausted Montrealers finally see the end of their 1998 Ice Storm captivity ordeal, individual stories of courage and determination have continued to emerge. The resolve of one lifelong resident was typical "Sure we had no heat, no light, no food. But at least we didn't have to import those pathetic Toronto bagels."

Daniel Johnson

In the end, Daniel Johnson resigned the leadership of the Liberal party in Quebec because he set national duty above personal aspiration. He understood well the deep implications of his persistent inability to rouse the popular support of the Quebec electorate in the recurring campaign against Lucien Bouchard and the separatists. He was opposed to the reference by Ottawa to the Supreme Court on the legality of a unilateral declaration of Quebec independence. He probably felt affronted by the declaration that the federal government would now be active on Quebec soil contesting separatist falsehoods and mendacities. And, adding to his discomfort, he had probably seen an advance copy of the much-publicized poll contrasting Jean Charest's "electability" in Quebec with his own inelectibility.

In an electronic, TV age of politics, he tried to emphasize policies over personality, smooth sound judgment over smooth sound bites. But his opponent was too much the expert practitioner of everything he was not. Thus, Johnson was doomed to fail in his pursuit of Quebec's premiership. However, for being an unambiguously proud, sincere federalist and for submitting himself to unwithering demagogic scorn and derision from his opponents, Canadians owe him a debt of thanks and gratitude.

Jean Charest

But will Jean Charest submit to the country-wide clamor and proclaim his candidacy to replace Daniel Johnson? We hope he does. We harbor no illusions that one or two polls conducted last week asking hypothetical questions in the abstract context of an inter-election period of time are the definitive last words on the outcome of any future election in Quebec. Public opinion, especially in Quebec, and especially on the issue of separatism, is too easily rendered incendiary to stand firm on any predictions. Moreover, to be effective, the Charest leadership in Quebec City can only succeed after an entente of some sort with the Chrétien leadership in Ottawa.

Rather, our opinion is based on the confluence of a number of factors:

- Charest seems to be the first choice of the Liberal party itself in Quebec.
- He enjoys a high degree of popularity among francophone Quebecers. This support may only be evanescent, but it at least provides an anchor at this stage, from which to stabilize the listing strategy of all federalists.
- He represents the future of Quebec. He embodies and can credibly speak for the generation of Quebecers younger than the separatist leadership, a generation that has not fashioned its federalist sincerities upon the memories or policies of the contemporaries of Pierre Elliott Trudeau.
- He has the intellectual capability and the campaigning skill to match Lucien Bouchard.
- He believes with all his heart in promoting, fostering and ensuring a strong, confident, prosperous Quebec within a strong, confident, prosperous Canada.

Build in any language

Federal Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard has completed her nation-wide consultations on the advisability of the recommendations contained in the advisory report she tabled earlier in the year called Not Just Numbers. The report and the results of the consultations are to form the basis for new immigration legislation sometime in the near future. One of the recommendations in the report proposed that eligibility for immigration require the ability to speak either English or French or to underwrite one's own language training. This recommendation is inappropriate and offensive. It ought to be rejected outright without reservation or qualification. It flies in the face of the history of this country, whose shores have welcomed immigrants and potential Canadians on the basis of their character and their promise to join with other Canadians in building a better country even as they strived alone to build a better life for their families.

Applauds series on eating disorders

I applaud The CJN for its series focusing on eating disorders in the Jewish community. Thank you for lifting the veil and acknowledging the existence of this very disturbing reality in our community.

The first steps towards healing lie in correcting the myth that "this doesn't happen in the Jewish community." While anorexia, bulimia and the lack of self-confidence that underlies both of these diseases are not exclusive to the Jewish community, we are most definitely not immune to them either. This applies to all Jews, frum and non-frum alike. Our denial of the reality of these diseases in our community, will only serve to perpetuate their destructiveness.

Charging $50 a date for "fat girls" attests to the fact that we may sometimes even aid and abet these disorders in destroying young women's self-worth, by reinforcing the ridiculous and unattainable ideals that the larger social forces impose on contemporary women.

I hope that this awareness will move us, as a community, out of our denial and towards a healing activism.

Yona Shem-Tov
Second year student, Jewish Education Program
York University

Editor's Note: The story referred to "overweight clients" not "fat girls."

Babies can take toll on the 'perfect figure'

I was moved to write by Frances Kraft's excellent series on eating disorders. I commend her efforts to raise awareness among young Jewish women about the perils of these illnesses, but hope that her articles will serve to educate young men as well.

In my experience as a shadchan, I have seen many lovely girls passed over as soon as the boy learns that she weighs more than the ideal standard set by today's society. Girls will continue to feel pressured to diet unrealistically, even at the risk of their health, as long as dress size continues to be a priority for young men.

I hope that the Jewish community at large will take up this issue, and that parents will also use the opportunity to discuss with their sons some of the more important qualities in choosing a life's partner: moral character, shared values, intelligence to name a few. These are certainly better criteria for determining the kind of wife and mother she will be. Boys need to realize that these qualities are enduring, while a couple of babies can take a real toll on that "perfect figure."

When young men approach women with more realistic expectations and an open-minded attitude, women will be less likely to succumb to the ravages of eating disorders.

Disappointed with Holocaust museum decision

The cancellation of the Holocaust museum as a component of the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa is a bitter disappointment to me.

In my opinion, everything about a separate location for a Holocaust museum is now up in the air, while the original plans would have enriched both the War Museum and the meaning of the Holocaust.

The old adage that a "bird in the hand is better than two in the bush" says it all, and furthermore, we will never find a more sympathetic and supportive group of people than those currently at the Canadian War Museum.

The Jewish community should know better than to have compromised what we have waited 50 years to realize.

120,400 Iraqi Jews went to Israel

The information provided by Keren Hayesod about the top 10 sources of aliyah (1948-1997) is incorrect. (CJN, Feb. 19).

I am wondering what happened to the 120,400 Jews who renounced their Iraqi nationality, lost their properties and moved to Israel subsequent to the birth of the State of Israel? How can this number be ignored?

About J.B.

In his article about J.B. Salsberg (CJN, Feb. 19), Sheldon Kirshner suggests that J.B.'s memoirs do not exist. In fact, in February 1973, Susan Cohen interviewed J.B. on tape and produced 50 typewritten pages of his recollections, transcribed by Bess Shockett.

J.B. Salsberg was one of the last members of Parliament to sit when the Liberals were in power in the 1940s.

When then-premier David Peterson formed the majority government in the 1980s, he honored J.B. by having him sit as a guest in the legislative chamber.

Second Purims commemorate miraculous rescues

By CHANA FALIK
Special to The CJN

Eleven years ago, I severely broke my ankle in a work accident. As the accident occurred outdoors an hour before dawn, there was nobody to whom I could call for help. I began crawling towards the home of some friends and all of a sudden, a man appeared, walking in my direction. Upon hearing my calls for help, he assisted me to my friends' apartment.

It was one week before Rosh Hashanah and he was on his way to synagogue – an hour earlier than usual – for the Selichot service at the dawn minyan. Every year on 22 Elul, the anniversary of this event, I make a "Second Purim" celebration in commemoration of my providential rescue.

The first Purim, of course, is the Purim we all celebrate in the month of Adar, which tells the story of the Jewish community's miraculous deliverance in 357 BCE from the hands of the evil Haman. The decree of Queen Esther and Mordecai, to make the 14th of Adar "a day of rejoicing, feasting and distribution of gifts for all generations," became a model throughout the centuries for all other Jewish communities. Hence, any miraculous rescue, such as from oppressive edicts, murderous pogroms or even natural disasters, came to be commemorated with a Second Purim.

Whole days are set aside by communities, families or even individuals, to celebrate their Second Purim, according to an interesting Web site entitled Other Purims, accessible through the Maven – [www.maven.com]. Sometimes they fall during the month of national mourning (Av), such as the Purim of Ibrahim Pasha, so-called because the Jews of Hebron were rescued by the Turks from the army of the Egyptian General Ibrahim Pasha. Sometimes they fall on holidays, as with Purim Carpentras, the anniversary of the saving of the French Jewish community of Carpentras in 1651 from a blood libel, on the eighth day of Pesach. And sometimes they fall on Purim itself, such as Purim Rhodes, when Sultan Abd-El-Magid saved the Jewish community of this Greek island from a massacre in 1840.

Sometimes a special megillah was composed to celebrate the Second Purim. One of the most famous of them all, The Hitler Megillah, was composed in honor of the Hitler Purim, the 20th of Kislev, by the Jewish community of Casablanca, North Africa, following their deliverance from the Nazi invaders in 1942. The megillah reads, "and the month... was turned for us from sorrow to rejoicing and the making of holiday and the giving of gifts to the poor. Cursed be Hitler, cursed be Mussolini."

Some record the rescue from natural disasters, such as Purim Paduva (1795), when the Jewish community in Paduva, Italy, was saved from a great fire. Others record examples of personal bravery, such as Purim Chios, also known as Purim de la Senora (1595 or 1820 – the date is disputed), where a Jewish woman saved the day by blowing up an ammunitions depot with a red-hot baker's shovel, thereby frightening the invading army and allowing resident Turks to rise up and defeat them.

Still others record the power of prayer, such as Purim Sharif (also called False Purim, to distinguish it from the "true" Purim in Adar), celebrated on 24 Tevet by the Jews of Tripoli. According to The Otzar Yisrael, published in Tel Aviv in 1916, the commander of the Tunisian army announced in 1705 that he would lay siege to and kill everyone in Tripoli. Following days of prayer led by the city's chief rabbis, a plague of pestilence spread through the attacking troops and the siege was broken.

Some days of Second Purim mark the saving from death of worthy individuals. One of the most well-known of these is the Purim of Rabbi Abraham Danzig. Rabbi Danzig was a scholar and poet. On the 16th of Kislev 1803, a huge explosion in a military camp near the rabbi's house rocked the area. While many houses were destroyed and people killed or injured, the rabbi's house was undamaged and its occupants unharmed.

No discussion of Second Purims would be complete without a mention of the infamous "New Haman," Vincent Fettmilch, who terrorized the Jews of Frankfurt-am-Main. The year was 1614 and Fettmilch, a baker, organized attacks on the city's Jews. Following a battle which lasted a day and a half, the Jews were forced to surrender. They were expelled from the city and forced to leave all their belongings behind. Several months later, upon learning that an outrageous injustice had been done to the Jews, the king of Germany commanded that the baker be killed, his house destroyed, his body beheaded, quartered and hung on the gates of the city.

The king called upon the Jews of Frankfurt to return to their homes with full honors. The story of Fettmilch's crimes and of his punishment were inscribed in German and Latin on a column erected on the site of his house. A Vincent Purim was proclaimed on the 20th of Adar, complete with a special fast and penitence, and Rabbi Elhanan Ha'elen composed a Vincent Megillah in Hebrew and Yiddish.

Hundreds of Second Purims were established throughout the ages in Israel and the Diaspora, although little evidence of them remains today. As one of the mitzvot of Purim is "to remember what Amalek did to you," it behooves us all to keep a record of these special Second Purim celebrations.

Heaven's hidden workings

By ERICA MAYER RAUZIN

As my daughter stands before me at Purim, dressed in all her finery as Queen Esther, I see three people.

I see my delightful and delighted child, wearing a long skirt and many necklaces and a fancy veil, dreaming that she is the queen.

I see this child as a woman grown, someone who has come into her own majesty as a responsible adult in the Jewish community, someone who will one day understand Jewish survival.

The third person I see is more shadowy, removed by time and storytelling. I see Queen Esther, herself, and I try to imagine her saga through her eyes. She is cloaked in mystery, although her story is told to us each year in apparent detail.

As often happens with the explanations behind Jewish holidays, it turns out there is much more to Megillat Esther than meets the eye. Much of what we popularly accept as part of the fairy-tale behind Purim isn't exactly so. Here's a glimpse of what else is there.

If you study what the scholars say (I asked a few people who know and I looked this up), Esther was not necessarily a young girl; she was at least 30. Esther was not necessarily physically beautiful, but she was possessed of a special calm serenity, a wisdom and charm that drew everyone to her. Some scholars say that Esther was not even single; that she was Mordecai's wife, illegally abducted by the henchmen who sought a bride for the King.

At the time of Purim, Esther was not — as many suppose — a newlywed Queen, drawing on novelty to make her case to the King. At the time she thwarted Haman's evil plot against the Jews, she had been married to Achashverosh for nine years. Many women lived in Achashverosh's harem, but history tells us that of them all, only Esther was granted the powerful privilege of privacy. Given that, she could keep Sabbath and she could keep kosher, and so she did, because Esther wasn't really Esther; she was Hadassah.

And, as often happens with Jewish sagas, the heart of the matter lies not in Persia, but in Jerusalem.

Remember Vashti, the first queen. She wasn't just a vain woman who refused to show her blotchy skin by dancing for the King's drunken guests. She was the granddaughter of Nebuchadnezzar, the evil conqueror of Israel who destroyed the Temple and exiled the Jews. Now, what does that have to do with Purim?

Well, Cyrus, the father of Achashverosh, was friendly toward the Jews. He ordered the rebuilding of the Temple and allowed the Jews of Persia to leave and go to Israel. Of the millions of Jews there, only 42,000 went (that's another story), but the rebuilding of the Temple proceeded.

Achashverosh halted the rebuilding, a decision he made under the influence of two people. One of them was Vashti, who urged him to return to her grandfather's policy. The other was Haman. Achashverosh had not decided to stop the rebuilding until his spies in Israel told him that the Jews would use a rebuilt Temple as the basis for starting a rebellion against him. Then he brought it to a stop. Who were the spies? The sons of Haman.

Ah, the plot thickens. This is more than a romance about a fast, a dinner party and a rescue. This is, as all our holidays are at base, a survival story.

Remember when Esther finally asks the King to grant her wish and he says he will, up to half his kingdom. What does that mean? It means that he will do as she asks, unless it jeopardizes his rule. What did he believe would jeopardize his rule? The Temple. In other words, not knowing that his wife is Jewish, the only limit he puts on granting her wish is that she cannot ask for the Temple to be rebuilt.

But Esther was eventually vindicated on that score as well. When her son, Darius, became king, he allowed work on the Temple to resume. That leads us to the other message of Purim: the hidden workings of heaven.

Don't wonder if – because the name of the Almighty is not mentioned in the entire Megillat Esther – He wasn't there; of course He was, as He is here, helping me see Esther through the learned eyes of the sages, and through the shining eyes of my costumed child.

The dream palace of the Jews

The Dream Palace of the Arabs by Fouad Ajami is a fascinating exception to most work written today by Arab intellectuals. It is highly critical of Arab intellectual thought, as well as of the political choices being made by Arab leaders of every persuasion.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Ajami's book is a refreshing change from the cliche-ridden and unflinchingly hostile attitude of most Arab intellectuals to Israel. My interest is in Ajami's thesis, which is that everywhere in the Arab world, violence, fanaticism, unrealistic dreams of conquest and terrible repression of their own people have obscured reality and led the Arabs to live in a dream palace.

Regrettable as it is, a similar dream palace is being erected for occupancy by the government of Israel and segments of its coalition, especially the Orthodox parties.

What are the rooms in this dream palace? One is the hope of the Netanyahu government that if it stonewalls the peace process, everything will be as it was. But to do nothing in the Middle East is to do something with great vigor, often leading to disaster. A resurgence of Palestinian street fighting is the least of the possible bad outcomes.

There are the many rooms built by the religious factions. The refusal of the Orthodox parties and the rabbanut to agree to the Ne'eman Committee's proposals, continued hostility to any non-Orthodox representation on religious councils and scabrous attacks on Reform and Conservative Jews, are part of the furniture.

Let's look at what's been said. From a letter signed by Shas mentor Rabbi Ovadia Yosef and a number of other rabbis: "When darkness covers the land, and the Reform and Conservative cults – the destroyers of religion – try putting their claws into the Holy Land and receive recognition as though they were streams of Judaism, God forbid, we are coming with this statement to express the opinion of Torah that it is inconceivable to give them any recognition at all."

I guess I am a destroyer of Israel and someone who has sunk claws into the State of Israel, because I see an Israeli dream palace rising. The builders of that palace think that if only they create a state in which only their one, narrow interpretation of Judaism rules, they will somehow assure the survival of their people. The need to assuage the wrath of the Almighty by narrowing choices is not new to Judaism. After the destruction of the Temple, rabbis were at pains to codify the oral law lest mistakes bring an even greater destruction. (It didn't help. Fifty years later the Bar Kochba rebellion wreaked even greater havoc.)

Some of the current Orthodox leaders in Israel, alas, are behaving like children who have been punished for doing something wrong. Believing that the Holocaust was the fault of Reform and Conservative Jews and Israel is the messianic future (although before 1950 many Orthodox rejected the state), they have obviously decided that it is better to delegitimize the majority of Diaspora Jews, who are by and large committed to the State of Israel, than risk further punishment.

As Rabbi David Hartman has written, this is a terrible mistake. He says, "The core of the issue is not conversion per se but the concession of religious ownership of Israel to the Orthodox establishment." Further, he asks, "How can Israel be vital for [Reform and Conservative] when they are told that their Judaic way of life is not welcome in this, their spiritual home?"

Both secular and Orthodox Israelis bear the burden of guilt for the present situation. They have no appreciation of what North American Judaism is like; the secular don't care and the Orthodox don't see how rich is the life of Jews elsewhere, how vital their schools and shuls, how committed they are to the continuance of Judaism. How sad, and how dangerous their lack of appreciation is for us all.

Months after my letter to Natan Sharansky over this whole business, I received a form letter which stated, in part: "It is important to realize that a dialogue is not the result of two separate monologues. It is the airing of views in an atmosphere of good faith where, at the very least, all sides can explain their respective positions and learn about the needs and concerns of all involved."

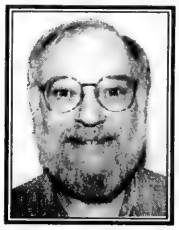
I would say that the positions are very clear, and all have heard them.

But while Sharansky closes his letter with a plea for compromise, it is hard to see how he has facilitated one, since he too remains part of the government that is the contractor for this dream palace.

I just hope it doesn't end up like the Arab one, filled with bitterness, totalitarian solutions and fanatic repression.

A case for lashon hara

So I walk into the office of the editor known as MBD, an acronym I'm told, for More Bad Days. I've got an idea and I pitch it to him quickly before he can finish peeling his orange.



By Shel Krakofsky in London

"What this paper needs," I tell him tilting my fedora for effect, "is a gossip column. Most of even the most respected papers have at least one. It fills a perverse need."

MBD ignores me and continues to peel the orange, his feet propped up on the desk.

"I've even got a title for it," I propose as he still avoids my eyes. "You know the gossip rag, Frank? Taking your readership into account, you could call it something like Max or Sam. And it will cost you next to nothing." I know what he pays his columnists.

MBD, silent, keeps working on the orange.

"Gossip is a form of moral inquiry," I say, pandering to MBD's legendary ethical standards. "Your readers have a right to know what ever happened to Eddie Fisher, the nature of Barbra Streisand's newest relationship, the name of Mordecai Richler's personal hair stylist."

The orange now naked, MBD finally looks at me, his eyes a combination of kindness and severity. He quotes Leviticus 19:16. "You shall not go up and down as a slanderer among your people."

Just in case I don't get it, he throws in a few verses from the Book of Proverbs against lashon hara, Hebrew for "the tongue of evil." He then lectures me about Rabbi Israel Meir Hacohen, the modest Lithuanian rabbi who died in 1933. He wrote a book about the prohibition of gossip and slander, published it anonymously and called it "Chofetz Chaim," desirous of life. The book made him so famous, he became known simply by the title of the book.

"Very admirable," I pamper. "And if you publish a gossip column, you'll be known as 'CJN.' It was Vladimir Nabokov," I remind MBD, "who termed rumor the poetry of truth."

He isn't impressed. Without eating the orange, MBD begins to peel another. A journalistic quirk. Maybe a subtle message. He says, "Some rabbis wrote that gossip is even worse than the three cardinal sins of murder, immorality and idolatry and even forbade the 'dust' of lashon hara, even if the derogatory remarks are true."

It's time for my bottom line argument. "Just think what such a column would do for the circulation of The CJN – not to mention the circulation of your readers," I throw in with aplomb.

MBD is not convinced as he completes peeling the second orange. "The Chofetz Chaim and the sages before him proclaimed that gossip and slander destroy three persons – the one who relates the slander, the one who hears it and the one about whom it is told," he says severely.

I don't give up. I tell him to be adventurous, to take risks, just like in the movie Casablanca. I trade him quote for quote pulling out the maxim embroidered on a cushion on a sofa at the home of Alice Roosevelt Longworth: "If you haven't got anything good to say about anyone…come and sit by me!"

Now two unclothed oranges sit on his desk. MBD opens a drawer and drops a thick file folder in front of him. "People send us all kinds of stuff. This is the shmutz on you. If we run a gossip column, you're not immune."

"You're bluffing," I bluff.

"Read it if you like," he says handing me the goods.

A mere glimpse reveals warts, quirks and skeletons. "If you print any of this," I threaten, "I'll sue you and the paper and create a libel chill that will make the Reichmanns, Conrad Black and Brian Mulroney look like heating contractors."

MBD begins to peel another orange and laments, "Of all the print joints in all the towns in all the world, you walk into mine."

I grab the folder, adjust my fedora and quickly leave. "Here's looking at you, Yid."

I have a plane to catch. An appointment at the Forward.

Taking responsibility for one another

Ever since the Oklahoma City bombings and the ensuing trials of McVeigh and Nicholls, the Militia Movement in the United States has come to the fore of public attention.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Just who are its supporters? They are Americans who have convinced themselves that the greatest enemy they face today is their own government, which they believe is involved in a terrible conspiracy to rob American citizens of their God-given rights. To be sure, there are also some identifiable enemies who are believed to manipulate the government to the detriment of all Americans, and amongst them – surprise! – are Jews, blacks, immigrants and others who may be characterized as "them."

One of the main accusations levelled against the government by the Militia people is its involvement with the United Nations, which they perceive to be a surrender of American sovereignty. For, so they proclaim, the United Nations aims at the creation of a world government whose major purpose will be to suppress and eliminate the United States and its freedoms.

I suppose that, in their script, people like me belong in the category of evil spirits who plan America's destruction. For I once was president of the World Federalists of Canada, part of a movement that indeed hopes to change the United Nations' structure into a more responsible organization from the present conglomerate of conflicting interests. Canadian Maurice Strong is one of the staunch advocates of this idea and therefore automatically makes himself the enfant terrible of the Militia.

But the concept of one world is not new; nor is it anything but a show of ultimate responsibility. A well-known Hebrew phrase is that kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh, all Jews are responsible to each other. But responsibility goes beyond our people. In a famous discussion over what might be considered the most important verse in the Torah, the palm finally went to Ben Azzai, who quoted an apparently innocuous verse in the sixth chapter of Genesis, "These are the generations of Adam." Why did he consider this so important? Because it shows that Torah is concerned with all of humanity and that it is Israel's function to exercise its responsibility to the peoples of the world and not only to itself.

In this respect it is interesting to note the Hebrew word for "responsible:" It is acharai, which is based on the same root as acher, other. Responsibility is in fact concern for others, nothing less and nothing more. A Montrealer, Kurth Koerbel, has recently published a book with the intriguing title, Our Responsibility to One Another.

Not surprisingly, Strong is an endorser of this volume. Its considerable intercultural scholarship presents no fewer than 134 different aspects of responsibility to one another.

One World is not an evil conspiracy but a worthy and essential human goal. We already speak of a global economy and the Internet is surely as global as we can be. What goes on in one part of the world is part of me, and Ben Azzai was right, for that is in fact the ultimate goal for Jews to strive for.

The Kirshner File

Ezer Weizman marches to his own drummer

By Sheldon Kirshner

As expected, Ezer Weizman coasted to a second-term victory over Shaul Amor, the virtually unknown Likud candidate, in last week's presidential election held in the Knesset. He beat Amor, the mayor of Migdal Ha'emek, by a margin of 63-49 (with seven abstentions).

Weizman, the nephew of Israel's first president, said he ran again to preserve national unity. But given the "foot-in-the-mouth" disease which occasionally afflicted him during his first term, Weizman's rationale seemed somewhat self-serving and disingenuous.

The least reticent of men, the loquacious and sometimes impolitic Weizman – a maverick throughout his political career – unloosed a series of sexist, homophobic and religiously insensitive remarks in his first five years as president.

Weizman also managed to annoy three Israeli prime ministers – Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu – who were less than thrilled by his decision to plunge headlong into the acrimonious debate over the efficacy of the Oslo peace process.

By adopting such a high profile with respect to social, religious and political matters, Weizman parted with tradition. All his predecessors, from Chaim Weizmann to Chaim Herzog, were exceedingly careful not to overstep the bounds of their ceremonial office. As a result, they usually stayed clear of controversial issues, at least in public.

Weizman, who parachuted into politics in 1969 straight from his position as commander of the air force, marches to his own drummer.

"I say what I think," he said once in an interview. "Nothing defines what I am allowed or forbidden to do." As president, he has hewed to this philosophy, giving himself ample latitude to speak his mind. The results have not always been felicitous.

In condescending fashion, he referred to a young woman whose goal was to be an air force pilot as a meidele, the Yiddish endearment for a mere girl. Weizman, who was instrumental in building the air force into a potent symbol and expression of Israeli military prowess, had evidently forgotten that women had served as pilots during the War of Independence.

He stirred further controversy when he characterized homosexuality, "this social anomaly," as abnormal. "I like it when a man wants to be a man and a woman wants to be a woman," he said blithely.

And he alienated pious Jews when he commented that there are segments of the Bible "not worth reading."

Weizman, however, has reserved his greatest passion for the Oslo peace process, which has split Israelis into politically opposing camps.

Upon winning the presidency in 1993 as the Labor party's candidate, Weizman put his fellow citizens on notice that he would not hesitate to air his views on existential matters like peace and security. He has kept his promise. Indeed, Weizman has consistently intervened in the peace process, either calling for a cautious reappraisal or trying to revive it.

First a hardliner, then a dove and now probably a centrist, he supported Israel's historic rapprochement with the PLO in 1993. Weizman, who had left the Likud over a dispute concerning the Palestinians, had advocated direct talks with the PLO when such contact was officially forbidden. As science minister in the national unity government in the 1980s, he incurred the wrath of the prime minister, Yitzhak Shamir, by meeting secretly with PLO officials.

In this spirit, Weizman welcomed the Declaration of Principles, as well as the first Oslo agreement in 1994. But Weizman grew wary of the peace process following a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv some months later. In fact, he refused to take a call from PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat in the wake of the Dizengoff Street blast. His disillusionment grew with the Beit Lid suicide bombing in January 1995. Weizman urged Rabin to suspend talks and "rethink" his strategy. After a Hamas attack on an Israeli bus in the Gaza Strip in April of that year, he suggested that negotiations be halted altogether.

Rabin, though shocked and disconcerted by these events, did not appreciate Weizman's outspokenness. He believed that Weizman was interfering with his ability to proceed with the peace process. The tension between them was not new. On the eve of the Six Day War, when Rabin was chief of staff, Weizman reportedly told colleagues that Rabin had suffered a nervous breakdown. Neither Rabin nor his wife, Leah, ever really forgave him for the alleged leak.

Shortly after the second Oslo accord was passed by the Knesset in the autumn of 1995, Weizman made waves again. Charging that it had been signed in haste and had been approved by only the skin of its teeth, Weizman declared: "A majority of 61 to 59 is a majority?"

In response to his criticism, two cabinet ministers lashed out against Weizman, saying he had done a disservice to himself and the presidency.

With the defeat of the Labor government and the accession of Benjamin Netanyahu as premier, Weizman continued to play the role of gadfly, but in reverse.

Israel's president is a gadfly

Two months after defeating Shimon Peres in the June 1996 general election, Netanyahu, who had demonized Arafat, still appeared reluctant to hold face-to-face talks with him. After receiving an urgent appeal from Arafat, Weizman announced that he would meet the Palestinian leader. Just hours later, Netanyahu said he would do so as well. Weizman's intervention had worked.

Weizman also gave the peace process a boost after an unprecedented outburst of Palestinian violence in the territories in September 1996 which resulted in the deaths of 15 Israelis and 70 Palestinians. He invited Arafat to his home, and Arafat, in his first official visit to Israel, accepted the invitation. When the meeting ended, Arafat told reporters that Palestinian police would not fire again on Israelis. Weizman had achieved his goals of smoothing over relations and assisting the peace process.

Shortly afterward, Weizman travelled to Cairo in an effort to improve Israel's deteriorating relations with Egypt. As defence minister in the late 1970s, Weizman had been one of the architects of the Camp David Accords and of Israel's peace treaty with Egypt. Having gained the trust of the Egyptians, he was thus warmly welcomed by President Hosni Mubarak. Yet Yitzhak Shamir, a hardliner, accused Weizman of seeking to "undermine" Netanyahu.

In the wake of the March 1997 Naharayim massacre, in which a Jordanian soldier killed seven Israeli school girls, Weizman called for a redoubled effort to move the peace process forward.

And just six months later, in a meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright in Washington, he asked her to "bang heads together" to get the peace process moving.

Weizman has also used his position to comment on two interrelated topics: the mini-war in southern Lebanon and the diplomatic impasse between Israel and Syria.

Last February, after three Israeli soldiers were killed in Lebanon, he declared that Israel "cannot start talking (with Syria) so long as things in Lebanon continue as they are now." But in May, in a volte face, he recommended that Israel return to the negotiating table with Syria. As he put it: "There can be no solution to the situation in Lebanon unless Israel and Syria sit down to negotiate."

Few would disagree with this sober assessment.

REENA GALA DINNER WILL HONOUR FAYE AND AL MINTZ

Proceeds to Reena's ElderHomes Project

TORONTO - When Faye and Al Mintz were first approached by Alex Eisen to be honourees for this year's Reena Gala, they were touched but hesitant about being the centre of attention. Both are well-loved and active in the Jewish community, but are unpretentious and unassuming and give generously but quietly.

"When Alex told us how we could help realize the creation of the desperately needed Reena seniors' housing project," explained Faye, "we knew that this was something we were proud and pleased to be part of."

"Alex Eisen has been an old and dear friend for more than half a century, and is Chair of the project," Al added. "We've been supportive of Reena since its inception and Alex asked us to attend that first Gala in 1980."

Al and Faye became more involved in Reena as the years went by. Al suggested his son Harley, now managing partner of the Chartered Accountancy firm of Mintz and Partners, as a welcome addition to the Board. Harley Mintz became Chairman of the Board of Reena in 1988 and assured his parents' continued active participation in all of Reena's fundraising ventures. Being an active volunteer is not something new for this family.

"It's in our genes," says Faye with a smile. "We inherited our belief in tzedakah and gemillut hasidim from our parents and we have proudly passed it on to our children."

Faye's volunteer commitment at Baycrest is legendary. She is an Auxiliary Life Member and for nearly 30 years has been a part of activities that enhance the lives of the elderly. Every Monday morning for two hours she is part of a committee that brings a lively and well-received music program to up to 50 appreciative seniors. She is a Baycrest tour guide, has planned an annual appreciation night for the 500 to 800 volunteers and has sat on committees and helped on projects whenever asked. Her inherent good nature has enabled her to act on the volunteer services committee which is a liaison committee with the professionals and is an important problem-solving vehicle for volunteers.

For many years Faye was an active member of Adath Israel Sisterhood and she is a Life Member of Hadassah-WIZO.

"Whenever my sister Jennie (Appleby) asks me to help, I never refuse," notes Faye. "I have been selling for her chapter at the Hadassah Bazaar every year for the past 35 and we always do well and have a great time together."

Al is a Life Member of Baycrest. They are long-time members of Adath Israel Congregation. Faye and Al have five children: Harley, married to Judy Nyman; Donnie, married to Ricky Fitzerman; Risa, married to Gary Himel; Bonnie, married to Nick Jackson; Steven, married to Heather Raz. They dote on their 12 grandchildren.

Faye and Al are not only committed to tzedakah for themselves and their families, but encourage all who know them to also be involved.

"Every partner in my firm must participate in a charitable cause." Al explains further. "Above and beyond our firm's commitment to UJA and the United Way campaigns, as part of the partnership agreement they must personally be involved in a cause of their choice."

"Reena has become very important to us through the years," adds Al. "We have been blessed in many ways. Our families, our friends and our ability to give and to help others at times like this, requires us to step forward on behalf of the Reena clients."

The first Reena ElderHome, which will be funded by money raised through the Gala, will allow older people with a developmental disability to receive the specialized care necessary for them and yet still live an independent life with dignity and friends and appropriate leisure activities.

The Reena Gala dinner in honour of Faye and Al Mintz will take place on Monday, June 22, 1998. For further information please call Julea Gasner, Coordinator of Special Events, at (905) 889-6484.

Wisdom of the ages

The Oxford Dictionary of Literary Quotations* edited by Peter Kemp (Oxford University Press, $49.50).

Old Age Comes At a Bad Time* by Eliakim Katz (Stoddart, $14.95, paper).

Wise Words: Jewish Thoughts & Stories through the Ages* by Jessica Gribetz (William Morrow & Co. Inc., $16.95, paper).

Next to being wise yourself, the best thing is to quote another's wisdom. Montaigne wrote, "I quote others only to better express myself," and Ambrose Bierce suggested that, "Quoting is the act of repeating erroneously the words of another."

The Oxford Dictionary of Literary Quotations is the most ambitious and far-reaching of the three books under review. It celebrates 3,000 years of writing and contains 4,000 quotations, thematically arranged, about writers and writing, from Egypt to the present day. It captures the diversity, richness, drama, hazards and rewards of the literary life.

- "Nothing I wrote in the '30s saved one Jew from Auschwitz." Auden.
- "My way of joking is to tell the truth; it's the funniest joke in the world." G.B. Shaw.
- "Dr. Donne's verses are like the peace of God; they pass all understanding." James I of England.
- "Whom the Gods would destroy they first call promising." Cyril Connolley.
- "From the moment I picked up your book until I laid it down, I was convulsed with laughter. Some day I intend to read it." Groucho Marx.
- "It takes a great deal of history to produce a little literature." Henry James.

Eliakim Katz, a professor of economics at the University of Toronto has put together a wonderful little book of quotations on aging. He has spent many hours in "resurrecting, extracting, collecting, rejecting and accepting" his material. The quotations are by turn thoughtful, wise, ironic, cynical, sad and outrageous.

- "For a fool, old age is winter; for a wise person it is a time of harvest." Jewish proverb.
- "My parents didn't want to move to Florida, but they turned 60 and it was the law." Jerry Seinfeld.
- "Wrinkles should merely indicate where smiles have been." Mark Twain.
- "The older I grow, the more I distrust the familiar doctrine that old age brings wisdom." H.L. Mencken.
- "In love, as in other matters, the young are just beginners." I.B. Singer.
- "I've been dead for two years but don't choose to have it known." Lord Chesterton.

This small-format book is garnished with amusing and appropriate woodcut illustrations.

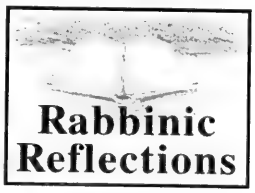
Wise Words: Jewish Thoughts & Stories through the Ages is a well chosen collection of aphorisms, poetry and proverbs taken from sources as familiar as the Bible and Talmud, and from modern day writers. There is a special emphasis on the all-too-forgotten voices of women. These selections are to be read and digested slowly and thoughtfully.

- "There are halls in heaven that open only to the voice of song." Zohar.
- "God, if you don't help me, I'll ask my uncle in America." Leo Rosten.
- "Getting inoculated with small doses of religion prevents people from catching the real thing." Sam Levenson.
- "To claim that a bagel has 500 calories, smacks, to me, of anti-Semitism." Judy Graubart.
- "Education is that which remains when one has forgotten everything he learned at school." Albert Einstein.
- "Cause no woman to weep, for God counts her tears." Talmud.



Rabbinic Reflections

Me and G-d come first

By RABBI MOSHE YERES

If I were to write a book on Jewish life and identity, I think I would probably call it Me and Me, Me and G-d, Me and the Jewish People. If we probe the character of our Jewishness, I'll bet we will agree on how appropriate this "title" would be. Everything we do relates to ourselves or to others or to G-d. Think about it carefully. Go back and review what you've done today. These are the three categories of who we serve: ourselves (me and me), the Almighty (me and G-d), others (me and people).

Now, which comes first in our priorities? If we're honest with ourselves, I think we'll probably say exactly that – ourselves, me and me and me – not to the exclusion of the other two, but one's self does come at the top of the list. It's human nature, so to speak. It is the rare exception when a person can completely sublimate himself to everything else in life.

But now comes the difficult choice. Which falls into second place: G-d or my friends, the Almighty or the rest of the world? Which gains priority over the other? It's a tough decision.

There is a lot of talk today about Jewish continuity of peoplehood. In order to survive, we need to keep creating and replicating Jewish communities and Jewish communal life. But can it be done if we limit G-d to a small sphere of our existence?

The story of Queen Esther, who is our heroine of Purim, shows these together at work. Esther, who initially appears quiet and introverted, has to deal with herself, her faith and her people. At first she seems to be caught up in her own life and self. She does not reveal her identity to anyone (Esther 2:10, 20), but seems to be concerned only with herself. Then, in the second half of the tale, she is forced to become the defender and champion of our people, which gives her the privilege of having the Megillah named after her and forever being known as the protagonist of the story.

So Esther begins with a "me and me" identity and develops her "me and the people" identity. This is the Purim story. But I wonder how she survived as a Jewess in Achashverosh's harem. She was pretty well cut off from her people. What gave her the impetus to be so forceful and to fight for the Jewish people?

I believe that she did so only by following the Jewish traditions while she was separated from her community; because she retained her identity with G-d, she never forgot her people. The rabbis in the Talmud say so on more than one occasion. They stress that Esther refused to eat treif, that she had seven maidens in order to mark the days of the week and never lose track of Shabbat, and that she carried out many of the Torah's laws (Talmud Megillah 13). But you don't need the Talmud to state this. It is just not logical that she, who was so physically separated from her people, could have felt so strongly about them if she retained none of their (and G-d's) traditions.

The message should be clear. Of all the books of the Bible, none so closely replicates the fate today of Diaspora Jewry, who are both accepted into the societies we live in and subject to those societies' influences. There are no super-miraculous, heavenly spectacles in the Megillah, just as today there are not. But the Jews survived on their own strength and wits.

So how do we survive? "Me and me" alone will not make it for our community. In order for Judaism to be there for our children and grandchildren, we cannot forget "me and G-d" and "me and the Jewish people." And please, put "me and G-d" up front.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Hope after the Shoah

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

A great deal of the way Jewish education is packaged today seems to revolve around the Holocaust and anti-Semitism in general.

This is understandable, but it can lead to some very unfortunate consequences, as many Jews have come to define their identities more around the persecutions of Jewish history than the inspiration of Judaism itself. In the vast majority of cases, children do not grow up to light Shabbat candles or pray to God because they were taught that Hitler wanted to exterminate us.

This was powerfully brought home to me a couple of years ago, when a Jewish man wrote an article in a major Toronto newspaper which expressed, with remarkable frankness, a dilemma he was undergoing. He was in love with and planned to marry a gentile, yet he was racked by guilt, because he felt he was disobeying what Emil Fackenheim called "the 614th commandment" – don't hand Hitler any posthumous victories. As Fackenheim had put it, "A Jew may not respond to Hitler's attempt to destroy Judaism by himself cooperating in its destruction." And by intermarrying, this man felt he would be discontinuing his Jewish lineage and that of his potential children.

His quandary was quite poignant, but what struck me was how inadequate Fackenheim's dictum is for perpetuating Jewish identity; guilt and the desire to deny Hitler any satisfaction are scarcely adequate reasons for remaining Jewish and in fact are to a large degree failing as deterrents to intermarriage as the years progress.

The objections to Fackenheim's "614th commandment" are fairly predictable. If you believe in the binding obligation of the 613 commandments, why do you need one more to retain connection with Judaism? And if you do not believe in God as a commanding presence whose laws are binding, then why would you want to pay attention to number 614? Furthermore, why should one's Judaism be defined centrally by rebellion against Adolph Hitler? Should this idea really lie at the heart of any religious expression by post-Holocaust Jewry?

The "614th commandment" was clearly aimed at secular Jewry, and it posed the challenge that assimilation would complete the job that Hitler had begun. As such, when Fackenheim first unveiled this reasoning in the 1960s, he certainly hit an emotional chord in the Jewish community. The "614th commandment" quickly became well-known, a kind of rallying cry for Jewish continuity.

Yet many Jews have responded to the Holocaust by becoming totally estranged from Judaism, quite the reverse of Fackenheim's imperative. To survive for its own sake as a Jewish nation ultimately challenges the notion that our survival is a means to a higher end, that we as Jews have something special to contribute spiritually to each other and to the world.

Viewing the Holocaust is like staring at the sun: first you experience dizziness, then blindness. Judaism must learn to cope with the inexplicable and still maintain its integrity and vitality; on the other hand, overusing the Shoah as a reason to inspire a whole new resurgence of Jewish observance is I think a shortsighted policy. Perhaps the Holocaust marks neither the death of Judaism nor its rebirth, an idea that was powerfully argued by the contemporary Jewish thinker, Michael Wyschogrod, who writes that "there is no salvation to be extracted from the Holocaust, no faltering Judaism can be revived by it, no new reason for the continuation of the Jewish people can be found in it. If there is hope after the Holocaust, it is because to those who believe, the voices of the prophets speak more loudly than did Hitler, and because the Divine promise sweeps over the crematoria and silences the voice of Auschwitz."

Jewish humor on the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: Why are we sure the computer was a Jewish invention?
Answer: Every keyboard has a scroll key.

Oy!

A riddle like that could only mean that it's time for my second annual Be-Happy-It's-Adar-Jewish-Humor-on-the-Internet column.

And once again, my second annual disclaimer. The late, beloved Jewish humorist Leo Rosten said, "Humor is the affectionate communication of insight." Unfortunately, humor on the Internet can be much less than affectionate. It can also offend. I have tried to recommend sites which will entertain, but due to the changing nature of the World Wide Web, you never really know what you're going to come across. You've been warned.

Calgary's Eliezer Segal has written several humorous articles, including one about an unpublicized trade pact between Israel and Poland surrounding a surprising commodity: discarded Hebrew vowels [http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Lighter_Index.html].

"Lifting a glass of vodka prior to the signing of the treaty, Polish bureaucrat Zbwgnv Plctytskv declared that the new agreement would indeed have momentous effects on Polish speech and literature... Following the Purim press conference, Zebewgoniew Polictyetov expressed his satisfaction over the deal, noting how much easier it is now to pronounce his name.

"Asked about how Israel would be able to manage without vowels, Mr. Kametz-Katon remarked that 'no one here ever uses vowels anyway except in children's books. Frankly, we have no way of storing the little dots, which keep falling out of their bags.'"

One of the places where North American Jewish humor came into its prime was in New York's Borscht Belt. Phil Brown has written an interesting essay on the Catskill Culture that flourished for much of this century. Although this is not strictly a humor page, it does give insight to a remarkable area of Jewish culture [http://www.brown.edu/Research/Catskills_Institute/culture.html].

And speaking of Borscht Belt humor, it would be impossible to do justice to all the comedians who have wowed them in the Catskills. But I do want to acknowledge the King-of-the-one-liners, who died very recently. You can find several on-line articles on the life [http://headlines.yahoo.com/Full_Coverage/Entertainment/Henny_Youngman_Dies/] and and humor of Henny Youngman [http://members.home.net/daughters/henny.htm]. A sample: "A car hit a Jewish man. The paramedic says, 'Are you comfortable?' The man says, 'I make a good living.'"

Take his jokes, please.

Question: Why didn't the computerized shofar work on Rosh Hashanah?
Answer: The Rabbi didn't buy enough RAM.

More humor next week.

Ne'eman Committee process a 'watershed' event

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

Reaction to the rejection of part of the Ne'eman Committee's proposal by the Chief Rabbinate's Council has been predictable, from anger on one side to smug self-justification on the other. Each reaction is understandable but unhelpful.

Guest Voices

No doubt there is cause for disappointment. It seemed that a worldwide formula was proposed that would satisfy all sides and put to rest a divisive issue that threatened to irreparably damage Israel-Diaspora relations. Yet although the proposal has not been accepted as the package intended, the entire process has proven a watershed.

When the idea of a committee was first proposed almost a year ago, there were the usual pessimistic predictions that surfaced. I did not doubt for the moment that representatives could be found that would sit together and map out solutions rather than air grievances.

But I was concerned about the composition of the committee: the Orthodox members far outnumbered, by 3 to 1, the non-Orthodox representatives. It seemed as if the deck was stacked against ever coming to a broad solution, let alone an amicable one. Yet the committee decided unanimously to establish a joint institute where each of the branches of Judaism would place their teachers. Courageously the non-Orthodox representatives ceded their right to seat their own rabbinical tribunals for conversions, for the greater good and cohesiveness of the Jewish community. And equally courageously, the Orthodox representatives agreed to officially work together with non-Orthodox rabbis.

More importantly, the proposal would also assure that only properly trained and scrutinized candidates will be presented for conversion, and that the conversions themselves will meet the highest standards of Jewish law. All this is a major victory for Jewish unity.

I am also cheered by the enormous public support for the Ne'eman Committee's proposal. More than 80 members of Israel's Knesset – including serving government ministers and the prime minister – signed a petition in favor of passage of the Ne'eman Committee's proposals, even without the comprehensive endorsement of the Chief Rabbinate.

The idea that a panel of Jews from disparate backgrounds could agree to anything, let alone on something so serious, has captured the Israeli imagination. For the first time in Israeli history and perhaps in all of Jewish history, a thorny political and religious issue was tackled frontally and solved cooperatively. That tone and style has been set and there will be no going back.

That the Ne'eman Committee's proposal was rejected in part by the Chief Rabbinate Council, does not mean that it received no favorable audience in the Orthodox rabbinic world. I had the privilege, in a delegation of other Conservative/Masorti rabbis, of meeting with Rabbi Yehudah Amital and Rabbi Aaron Lichtenstein at Yeshivat Alon Shevut in the Gush Etzion shortly after the Chief Rabbinate published its response.

These two prominent authorities are part of a growing Orthodox rabbinic groups called Meimad, an organization that has its roots in the tradition of religious nationalism. Rabbi Amital spoke simply but eloquently when he referred to an Israeli road sign designed to reduce traffic accidents and deaths. The sign read: "Be Wise and Don't Try to Be Right." He explained that when the Jewish future is at stake, when assimilation and secularism are eating away at our core, it is not the time to debate which approach to Judaism is right or to stand on principle. Instead, it is time to work together and find ways of cooperating, to build up respect and knowledge of our tradition in every possible venue.

Rabbi Amital did not think that the Ne'eman Committee's proposal is a perfect one, but it is a workable one. Wisdom demands that we build on it.

I am hopeful that the momentum the Ne'eman Committee generated will not be dissipated. The committee proved that with mutual respect and high-minded ideals, there is no problem among Jews that cannot be tackled and solved. The committee's proposal may not have been entirely embraced, but the committee's work was far from a failure.

Jurist pushes for international war crimes court

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Momentum is gathering worldwide to create a permanent international criminal court to try war criminals, however, proponents of the court must guard against it becoming so watered down that it loses its credibility, a prominent Canadian jurist warned last week.

Louise Arbour, prosecutor with the International Criminal Tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia, said an international meeting will be held in Rome in June to discuss creation of a permanent international court. Unless an independent court is created, tribunals to try war criminals would have to be established on an ad hoc basis by the United Nations Security Council, leaving the court open to criticism that it is simply serving as a political weapon for the benefit of the great powers. That would detract from the court's legitimacy and credibility.

"If we don't set it right, right from the outset, we will miss an opportunity," she said.

Arbour, on leave from the Ontario Court of Appeal, was speaking at a Canadian Club luncheon at the Royal York Hotel. She used the opportunity to encourage the blue ribbon audience to urge the Canadian government to exercise diplomatic leadership as it did in the land mines issue to push for the creation of a permanent court. The proposed court "would restore the humanity and dignity of the victims, which offenders were trying to destroy.

"A permanent court won't stop all wars...but its jurisdiction could be triggered at a time of armed conflict" when civilians are endangered and persecuted.

Such a court would have the right to try alleged war criminals and enforce international law against war crimes, she said. Like any criminal court, it wouldn't deter all crimes but it would prevent some and it would deprive perpetrators of impunity. "It [would] affirm universal goals of good over evil," she said.

For such a court to work, it must have an independent and accountable prosecutor and its orders must be respected internationally, Arbour added.

Arbour pointed out that two international tribunals are currently trying war crimes cases arising out of the genocide in Rwanda and the civil war in Yugoslavia. Those tribunals are "the laboratories" and the "blueprint" for a permanent court, she suggested.

Twenty-three Rwanda suspects, including senior government officials, are in detention awaiting trial and three trials are under way in neighboring Tanzania. In The Hague, where Yugoslav trials are being held, 24 suspects are in detention and three trials are ongoing. One suspect has already pleaded guilty to war crimes.

The courts are important tools in building permanent peace and reconciliation in Rwanda and Bosnia, she said.

But ad hoc bodies suffer from a fundamental flaw – the perception that outside powers that would establish the courts would be motivated by political concerns and would not dispense justice fairly and transparently. That sort of problem would be avoided if a permanent court existed, she argued.

Arbour pointed out that the war crimes tribunals face major difficulties. The cases are enormously complex and require much preparatory work.

Those accused of crimes "are not ideal candidates for bail" and so alleged perpetrators, who are considered innocent until proven guilty, must spend long terms in custody pending trial.

The tribunals don't have a police force and can not offer protection to witnesses, so they must rely on friendly governments for witness relocation programs, she said.

It is also very difficult to bring the most senior perpetrators to justice. The tribunals are committed to pursuing the evidence wherever it leads, she said.

Despite the difficulties, Arbour noted the Yugoslav prosecutors have a budget of $68 (US) million and a staff of 600 while prosecutors in the Rwanda genocide were given a $50 million budget.

BQ leader to address CJC

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though it opposes his position on taking Quebec out of Canada, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress has invited Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe to address it in mid-May and Duceppe has accepted.

"His view will be vigorously opposed and if we had any doubts we would not go forward with it," said chair Moshe Ronen at the recent Ontario region executive meeting.

The decision to invite Duceppe was opposed by Judge Sydney Harris, a region executive member. "The media will twist it to make it look as if Congress supports the bloc," Harris said.

It was also opposed by Sol Friendly, a World War II veteran, who said it was wasted money.

"The media is well aware of our position of opposition," said Ronen, who explained that Max Bernard, of Montreal, chair of the CJC's national unity committee, will respond to Duceppe.

"It will be a good chance to get our message across," said former MPP David Rotenberg, supporting the decision.

"It is important to listen to him," said Esta Pomotov, a Congress officer, while the invitation was also supported by Donald Sklar.

The invitation was issued because the political situation vis a vis Quebec has come to the forefront faster than anticipated, said Bernie Farber, executive director.

"One of the ingredients missing in the situation is the understanding of the passions on both sides," said Farber.

Duceppe will speak in English, though he was offered the chance to speak in French, Farber said.

Ellen Cole suggested that the Italian Canadian Society and the Hellenic group be asked to co-host the meeting to give it broader appeal.

Conservatism's political pendulum swinging back to centre: Segal

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The era of moderate Canadian conservatism is returning, says one of the country's leading Tory thinkers.

Moderate conservatives – those who temper their thoughts and actions with compassion – "are on the cusp of taking momentum back from the far right," longtime Tory insider Hugh Segal last week told members of United Jewish Appeal's newly formed Civil Servants' Division.

Those on the far right, including some members of the Reform party, "have had a good run. But the pendulum is coming back to the centre," said Segal, who once served as chief of staff to former prime minister Brian Mulroney.

One reason conservative thought is returning to moderation is that "more Canadians believe that government is government and business is business."

The recent ice storm in Quebec and eastern Ontario proved that Canadians are a civil people who care about each other, Segal told the small audience.

He said he worries that if the far right's views are taken to their logical conclusions, Canada would cease being a caring country.

Social safety net

"The far right is not wilfully evil, but they've lost the distinction between the have-nots and the will-nots. They've lumped them together."

Segal said he's "troubled" that some in the Reform party have accepted a U.S. style of conservatism, and are trying to apply it in Canada. "At the core, [Reformers] have a problem," because so many of their policies, especially on immigration, are "exclusionary."

However, "as a conservative, I don't believe people always act in the best way. We need structure, rules and law."

Segal said he believes in equality of opportunity, while those on the far right espouse equality of outcome.

As a Jewish child growing up in Montreal, he said, he often felt like an outsider. His early affinity to the Progressive Conservatives came about because the party reached out to outsiders, like farmers and fishermen.

His brand of politics, embodied in former Ontario premier Bill Davis and former prime minister John Diefenbaker, has always balanced free enterprise with reaching out to the disenfranchised and supporting a social safety net, he said.

Segal even predicted that moderate, compassionate conservatism will be the "dominant theme" in Ontario's Mike Harris government "in time."

He said he hopes federal Conservative leader Jean Charest stays on in his job, and said he's against the idea of the Progressive Conservatives and the Reform party merging.

Hadassah chapter set for disabled women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto Hadassah-WIZO is in the midst of forming a chapter for women with physical disabilities.

Sharon Kroft, Toronto president, says that as far as anyone knows, this is the first chapter of its kind in Canada. "The chapter, which should be ready to start up sometime after Pesach, will be open to women with any level of disability – women who often find it difficult to attend meetings because they are held in members' homes which are usually not accessible."

All meetings, says Kroft, will be held in wheelchair and scooter-accessible buildings, in areas that are on Wheel-Trans routes. "We will also meet all attendant needs as they come up. There will be people to help serve coffee, take members to the washroom – whatever is necessary. We are just in the forming stage; so we have to see what members' needs are."

She stresses that the organization is not attempting to segregate disabled women. "We are giving women the opportunity to get out and enjoy meetings that, typically, they may not attend. We want them to have somewhere to go where they do not have to worry about physical boundaries. In the future, we plan on holding our general meetings and programs in venues that are fully accessible."

As with all new chapters, says Kroft, the organization will help arrange programs. "Everyone has heard of our annual bazaar, but not everyone knows that there is a large educational component to our organization. We plan on arranging programs that are of particular interest to these new members."

Mindy Pearlman, who is helping to organize the chapter, says that this should alleviate the fear many disabled women have of joining an organization.

"It is very difficult to arrive somewhere and discover that it really is not fully accessible. People stay away from places that they do not find inviting."

Pearlman, who has multiple sclerosis and alternates between using a wheelchair and a motor scooter, says she has researched various locations that are both physically accessible and accessible by Wheel-Trans.

"If the women feel comfortable at the meetings and enjoy coming, they will get involved in the organization. There are a lot of things they can accomplish."

She says says she is planning lectures and seminars, but welcomes feedback from prospective members. Call Hadassah-WIZO at 630-8373.

Informal Orthodox coalition encourages Jewish unity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An informal group of Orthodox Jews from the United States, Canada and Israel are taking positive steps to encourage Jewish unity.

Am Echad, a coalition of Jews from across the Orthodox spectrum, includes Mizrachi, Young Israel, Rabbinical Council of America, and Agudah.

The group has taken a series of ads in both secular and Jewish newspapers stressing its belief that Jews should work together to deal with their problems. (The first ad in The CJN is scheduled for this issue.)

Mordechai Mandelbaum, a Toronto spokesperson for Am Echad, told The CJN that the group was formed "because a lot of people in the Orthodox world are increasingly alarmed at the rhetoric about the pluralism issue, and how the Orthodox have been painted."

What is coming across to the typical person in the street, he said, is the notion "that the Orthodox don't consider Conservative and Reform Jews to be Jews. We would like to articulate in a public forum that this is not the case."

Mandelbaum acknowledged that there are varying opinions with respect to conversion in Israel, for instance. "These issues should be resolved without the use of rhetoric, and without misrepresenting the view of the Orthodox.

"Every Orthodox Jew believes that every Jew is holy," he said flatly. "You won't find any credible person who will dispute that."

The ads are targeted, not at the leaders of the Conservative and Reform movements, but at the large number of unaffiliated Jews.

Each ad is different. The first one, with the caption "No Matter How We Celebrate Chanukah, We Are All Jews," has four pictures, two with different kinds of menorahs, one with no menorah, and one with the message.

While the ad recognizes that there are differences in how Jews view the issues of the day, "All we ask is that the dialogue be conducted with integrity."

The second ad features David Ben Gurion, and notes that Israel's first prime minister was "by no means Orthodox," but he was the person who instituted the so-called "status quo" rule in Israel, that matters of personal status, conversion, marriage and divorce, are subject to "Halachah – traditional religious law."

The third ad, the one that will run in Canada, shows the results of the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey, the 1991 Jewish Population Study, and research conducted by Antony Gordon and Richard Horowitz from 1993 to 1997.

The studies show a decline in all segments of the Jewish population except for the Orthodox.

The ads call for all Jews to work toward Jewish continuity, and say that the key to this continuity is Jewish education.

While the ads make clear the group's belief that Halachah remains the sole standard for personal status, Am Echad stresses the need for constant and civil dialogue between those with differing views.

BJC dedicates room to honor Lonnie Clemens

TORONTO — Honoring the memory of Lonnie Clemens, a Special Needs Program room donated by his family was dedicated at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) recently.

A vibrant, outgoing young man, Lonnie, who had developmental disabilities, had a full-time job at McDonald's and was an avid sports fan. He died May 10, 1995, at the age of 28.

Lonnie spent a good portion of his leisure hours at the BJC. His participation and volunteering in the special needs program led to his being honored in 1992 at the annual Sports Celebrity banquet. He received a special videotaped address by Wayne Gretzky and was presented an award by Eric Lindros.

As an advocate for the BJC and a "natural" in front of a camera, Lonnie appeared in a promotional video on the value of special needs programs.

His parents, siblings, nieces, nephew and many friends attended the dedication.

UJA MISSION MARKS HISTORIC ANNIVERSARY

Not even the tension with Iraq could stop nearly 200 Toronto members of Mission '98 from visiting Israel. They left on February 23, when the United States was still considering a deal between Iraq and the United Nations. The crisis was resolved by the time mission members landed in Tel Aviv. Now mission participants are back with no regrets whatsoever about helping Israel celebrate its 50th anniversary.

"When I arrived in Israel, I felt absolutely calm and confident about being here," said Mission '98 Toronto Chair Sandra Brown.

"We had been to Israel before," added Dodi Weill who traveled with her husband Robert. "Nothing could stop us from celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary, especially on a UJA Federation sponsored trip."

The historic tour, which attracted 300 people from across Canada, offered experiences for both first time travelers and veteran visitors. "This was my first trip to Israel, and after seeing Yad Vashem, I feel more attached to the country. I understand what a terrible cost we paid because we didn't have a Jewish state," recalled mission participant Harvey Presement.

Mission '98 celebrated Israel's 50 years of achievement

The 50th anniversary mission was a journey from the top to the bottom of Israel, beginning with Canada Centre in Metulla, Israel's northernmost community, and ending with a gala goodbye dinner in Eilat, the country's most southern city. Along the way, there were visits to the most significant sites in Israel's 50-year history and briefings by Israeli leaders.

"We were one of the first groups in Israel to mark the country's Jubilee," observed Brown. "I am thrilled that we provided support and solidarity at such an important time. To be able to experience the celebration of a generation was truly a once in a lifetime opportunity."

One of a kind academy

The Leo Baeck Education Centre, supported in part by United Israel Appeal, through UJA Federation donations, has its sights set on the world. Plans are underway from the Centre's Haifa headquarters to build an international academy to study urgent Jewish issues.

The $20 million initiative would bring Jews of all ages from around the world to live at the academy for a specified period of time and learn with students born in Israel, Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union. "We would like to integrate them at both an educational and social level," said Leo Baeck's Director of Development Aharon Pulver.

A dormitory with 150 beds would be set aside for Israelis who speak Hebrew, English, Russian and Amharic (the language of Ethiopia) and a 250-bed hostel would be built for international visiting students. "We might even have an elder hostel," added Pulver, who has led the drive to raise $7 million so far of the $20 million required.

The Leo Baeck Education Centre, built in 1970, and founded by Reform Rabbi Robert Samuels, thrives on innovation. Among the facility's services is a legal aid program, primarily for Russian and Ethiopian immigrants, which handles over 2,000 cases a year. "Contractual agreements are foreign to Ethiopian culture," noted Samuels.

Over 1500 junior high and high school students attend full time classes at the Centre, which also houses a 650-seat auditorium, programs for the disabled, a small synagogue and a community centre which incorporates Judaism into every activity. "A person may play sports, then participate in some form of Jewish education before joining us for Kabbalat Shabbat (welcoming the Sabbath)," Samuels explained.

"Mainly," said Samuels, "we provide people with Judaism, which they may not have."

Dinner serves spiritual needs

Over 100 young adults recently demonstrated the power of the Jewish spirit at a unique program, sponsored by HOT (Hands on Toronto), an initiative of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet.

The event, Shabbat Among Friends, a traditional Shabbat dinner at Kehillat Shaarei Torah Synagogue, was such a success that plans for the next one are already in the works. "The response was overwhelming," says David Beron, who co-chaired the program with Lori Winch and Alan Krolik. "Our goal is to reinforce the 'J' in UJA Federation. We believe the celebration of the Sabbath is a great way to promote Judaism and get young adults in touch with their Jewish roots," Winch observes.

The dinner, according to Beron, illustrated the need to create Jewish experiences for young adults. "We want people to know that UJA Federation is much more than just fundraising," he says. "We have a responsibility to instill Jewish experiences in young adults, and this dinner reflects the beginning of something truly special."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah echoed similar sentiments in his message to the group. "There is nothing more spiritual than spending Shabbat dinner with Jewish people of different backgrounds, because it is the commonality of Shabbat that unites people."

The evening also included Rabbi Ari Israel, the Hillel Director in Rochester, New York, whose unique game, The Jewish Futures, provided an interactive discussion among participants. "I believe the game really put things into perspective and got people thinking about the importance of taking control and shaping their Jewish future," says Beron.

HOT is planning a series of Shabbat dinners over the next several months to explore issues such as continuity and pluralism. At other recent programs, HOT members cleaned the apartment of a Jewish Family & Child Service client and visited nursing home residents.

For more information on HOT, call Elana Carr at (416) 631-5736.

Immigration proposals slammed

Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard held the cross-country public hearings following January's release of Not Just Numbers, an independent report that calls for radical changes to immigration and refugee rules.

Jewish groups concede it's unlikely Robillard will scrap the document; so they're hoping she will at least reconsider parts of it.

Robillard has tried to defuse some of the concerns by saying these are recommendations, not policy.

B'nai Brith said the report is "not worthy of Canada."

In its submission during two days of hearings in Toronto, BBC said its concern emanates "from the experience of the Jewish community in this country."

Among its concerns are a suggestion to scrap the current Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) and replace it with a new agency run by civil servants to handle all refugee claims, as well as appeals of claim denials.

At a press conference prior to their appearance at the hearings, BBC officials pointed out the dangers of allowing civil servants to decide who gets asylum.

"It was civil servants who kept Jews out of Canada," said Michael Schelew, a former deputy chair of the IRB who advises B'nai Brith on immigration matters.

Allowing bureaucrats to decide refugee claims would politicize the process, Schelew said.

"It's inevitable that foreign affairs considerations would take precedence," he said.

And allowing civil servants to hear appeals of denied refugee claims would be even worse, BBC said. It would lead to one bureaucrat hearing the appeal "of his colleague across the hall" – all behind closed doors. Current appeals are heard in Federal Court.

BBC also blasted the report's suggestion to deny refugee status to those who could have sought asylum in a safe third country en route to Canada.

Another concern of all Jewish immigration advocates is the proposal to slash the time it must take a refugee claimant to file a claim. Communal officials say the new recommendation amounts to not nearly enough time to prepare and file a case.

Schelew said the report makes family reunification more difficult because it caps the age of single dependents at 22, an age at which many post-secondary students still rely on their parents.

The proposal requiring English or French, or proficiency tests, is "absurd" and misguided, especially for children, BBC said.

The report says Canada should put more emphasis on so-called economic immigrants, those with money to invest. BBC pointed out that currently, over two-thirds of newcomers in the business class speak neither English nor French, "and that hasn't prevented them from making a contribution to Canada."

Currently, immigrants are evaluated on a point system that takes into account criteria such as language, job skills and education, but allows for wide discretion by visa officers if points don't add up. BBC fears the "abolition" of that discretion.

In all, the report "is fundamentally flawed. It is about numbers. It's not fair and it's not democratic. We are asking the minister to scrap it, and stop the consultation," Schelew said.

At the Toronto press conference, Guidy Mamann, representing JIAS's national operations, said the report would "throw us back 10 or 20 years."

There are some positive elements in it, "but they are lost in a sea of negative attitudes." The report "looks for ways to create barriers."

The national office of JIAS was denied permission to appear before the hearings, along with dozens of other groups. But JIAS's Montreal branch and CJC in Quebec told the hearings that they applaud the recommendation to create a cadre of qualified civil servants to hear refugee claims and appeals.

However, the brief stated, the person conducting the appeal should be neutral and separate from the initial decision maker.

JIAS and Congress said appeals should apply to refugee claims made overseas, and not just those made inside Canada.

While "serious" changes to the refugee system are necessary, there's no need to create new agencies, JIAS and Congress said. Solutions to today's problems could be implemented by making changes to the current system and by adding some new policies, they said.

יהודי הוליבוד:

Based on the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey, the 1991 NY Jewish Population Study and research conducted by Antony Gordon and Richard M. Horowitz 1993-1997 and published in Moment, The Jewish Spectator, and The Vanishing American Jew by Alan M. Dershowitz

BECAUSE WE'RE ALL CONCERNED WITH JEWISH CONTINUITY, LET'S WORK TO CHANGE THE STATUS QUO IN NORTH AMERICA.

NOT IN ISRAEL.

The Vanishing American Jew. It's not just the name of a book. It's a fact. And demographic studies indicate further decline among most segments of North American Jewry.

The numbers should shock us, but not surprise us. So many Jewish children have little or no connection with their ancestral faith. They see no compelling reason to marry other Jews. Or to want to stay Jewish themselves.

CONFRONTING REALITY

Let's face it. If the success of a Jewish movement is measured by its ability to preserve Jewish identity and ensure Jewish continuity, the statistics point to serious failings.

Yet some Jewish leaders insist that the North American model, which has led to an alarming loss of Jewish identity here, be exported to Israel. They demand that Israel abandon her recognition of Halacha, traditional Jewish law, as the sole standard for marriage, divorce and conversion. The standard that is the common denominator for all Jews. And the status quo in Israel since its inception.

THE KEYS TO CONTINUITY

The lesson of the chart is clear. The greater our commitment to our mutual 3,000 year old Jewish religious heritage, the greater our chance of surviving as Jews. The study of Torah and the observance of Mitzvot are now - as they have been throughout our history - the only keys to Jewish continuity.

That is why a classical Jewish education must be our ultimate priority. For ourselves, for our children. And for all the Jewish generations to come.

Am Echad is a coalition of Jews from across the spectrum of Orthodoxy deeply concerned about all our Jewish brothers and sisters.

Call us at 1-888-44-AMECHAD (1-888-442-6324) or write to us at 1819 Glendale Ave., Montreal, Quebec H2V 1B4. We can provide you with a list of Jewish schools and adult education programs in your area. We can also send you more information about the chart above and a brochure about pluralism in Israel.

It's time we asked ourselves a simple question. Why work to change Israel's religious status quo when our own is in such a state of crisis?

York Israel Day attracts 300

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University's recent Israel Day drew an estimated 300 students to the Ross Building's Bear Pit to hear Israeli music, eat kosher falafel and learn about student opportunities to travel to Israel.

A visitor to the university, 25-year-old Randa Hammadieh, found the music and displays (consisting mostly of travel posters and student photographs taken on trips to Israel) "a refreshing change from the usual political debates."

A hijab-wearing Canadian of Syrian descent, Hammadieh said her family's village is five minutes from the Golan Heights. She was drawn to the campus display by the "really upbeat" Israeli music.

"I think it's good that [York has] an atmosphere conducive to all different cultures," she said.

York University student and keyboardist Ilan Gordon plays Hebrew songs at this year's Israel Day event. [Frances Kraft photo]

The annual event was deliberately apolitical, said Pearl Gropper, director of York's Jewish Student Federation (JSF). Organizers wanted to avoid the type of tensions that arose during Muslim Awareness Week in November, when Jewish students filed complaints about a particular speaker.

The issue has not yet been put to rest, as evidenced by the Letters to the Editor page in a recent issue of Excalibur, York's campus publication.

At the Israel Day event, students Isaac Ashaurov and Chani Berkovitz, accompanied by Ilan Gordon on keyboard, sang Hebrew favorites like Halleluya.

Sharon Aba, of JSF's Israel awareness committee, announced the opening of the student organization's new Israeli culture room. The previous storage area has been refurbished with an Israeli ta'am (flavor) and will offer activities like shesh-besh (backgammon) and Hebrew videos.

Representatives from organizations including Tel Aviv University, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Aish HaTorah, Otzma and Sar-El staffed tables, and students had the opportunity to win a trip to Israel this summer, courtesy of the Hebrew University.

Miriam Romberg, a final-year student in Jewish Education, said it was the liveliest Israel Day she'd seen in four years at York.

"It brings a feeling of Israel into York," said third year business student Simmy Zieleniec.

Profs back from Europe

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York University professors Michael Brown and Irving Abella recently returned from the former Soviet Union and Germany, respectively.

Brown, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, was an invited speaker and the only foreigner at a regional Jewish Studies conference held in Saratov, on the banks of the Volga River.

The Centre for Jewish Studies and Saratov State University (where the conference was held) linked up over a year ago. The latter is working toward starting a Jewish and Religious Studies program.

"It's heroic work and very exciting," said Brown.

"We're still working on raising funds for distance education [using] telecommunications," Brown added.

Abella, who is a history professor, was an invited speaker at a Munich conference co-sponsored by the Montreal Holocaust Museum, the State government of Bavaria and the city of Munich.

He debated the subject of Swiss behavior during the Holocaust with Swiss diplomat Claude Altermatt, chair of the task force investigating Switzerland's role during the Holocaust.

The audience, consisting mostly of German and Austrian high school teachers, responded more favorably than Abella had anticipated. "I realized that every time I was making a point about Swiss misbehavior, I was sort of lessening the burden on Germans. Nevertheless, the true evil was in Germany. [The Swiss actions] could not have been possible without the Nazi misbehavior."

Holocaust education – including trips to concentration camps and even to Israel – has been on the rise in Germany in the past decade, he noted.

"Certainly the children and the teachers indicate they are determined to learn and are confronting the past."

Probably the most emotional event of the four-day conference was a specially arranged concert in the former Nazi Convention Centre headquarters, now a cultural centre. The musicians included recently arrived young Russian Jews and established members of Munich's Jewish community.

Winnipeg supermarkets drop kosher products

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post & News

WINNIPEG — Bert Schaffer used to be able to find a wide assortment of kosher products at Supervalu, ranging from gefilte fish to Shabbat candles. He can't any more.

"Supervalu has dropped all kosher products – even Passover foods, here and in the South End," the kosher-observant North End Winnipegger claimed last month. But a national spokesperson for the Canadian chain of giant supermarkets cites lack of demand for the removal of the kosher food sections here.

Schaffer has been working quietly since last fall to try and find out why the Winnipeg outlets have stopped offering kosher and kosher-style products in their ethnic foods sections, which he says were on the shelves as late as last spring.

"The ethnic foods section used to have...matzah, gefilte fish, candles, matzah ball mix, latke mix – the regular assortment of kosher foods.

"I wrote to the marketing manager of Western Grocers, the owners of the Supervalu chain [also known as The Real Canadian Superstores], in early December. He didn't have a specific answer."

Schaffer also spoke to the manager of Supervalu's McPhillips Street store last November. "He indicated that they were just given directives that they were dropping" such products.

"It's not a matter of the products being available," Schaffer said. A number of Canada Safeway stores and other food outlets in the North and South Ends stock such items. What bothers him is the "principle" that Supervalu, a chain with extra-large stores, has dropped every single kosher or kosher-style product it used to carry.

"When you consider all the foods in there – almost every ethnic food – you could almost represent it as an anti-Semitic act."

The fact that Supervalu stocks a wide variety of ethnic products is easily confirmed by a visit to the McPhillips Street store. Three aisles of multi-layer shelves hold hundreds of products from more than a dozen ethnic groups, including pickled garlic from Iran, quail eggs from southeast Asia and Egyptian lemons from Montreal.

Schaffer, a member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) board, asked Evelyn Hecht, the WJCC's community relations director, to write to the chain on behalf of local kosher-observant Jews.

Hecht called The Jewish Post & News several weeks ago, advising that she did write, and got a letter of reply from David Ryzebol, the Real Canadian Superstores' public affairs director.

"We have received a few calls about the removal of the kosher food section, and we very much understand the concerns," the Calgary-based Ryzebol writes in his Jan. 22 letter, a copy of which Hecht faxed to Winnipeg's Jewish weekly. "Our category managers have to decide on tens of thousands of products. [Customers] vote each day with their dollars. The products that have very low sales are eventually removed from the shelves.

"The simple reason for the removal of kosher food products is lack of sales. It is my understanding that there has been a decline in the sale of kosher food products across the city of Winnipeg and at other stores.

"Unfortunately, we are not able to solve this concern to meet the needs of the few people who buy kosher food."

Gabe Brojges, kashrut coordinator for the Vaad Ha'ir, the body regulating kashrut in Winnipeg, agreed to speak to The Jewish Post & News last week as an individual. He said that while local Supervalus no longer have specifically kosher food sections, the stores still feature a "very good selection" of products in other sections with kosher labels, ranging from fish to breakfast cereals to juice crystals.

In many cases, he added, the products are the chain's no-name brands, meaning the chain's owner, Western Grocers, specifically ordered food suppliers to make them kosher. Brojges added that he's always found employees in the store's head office "most cooperative, whenever we ask for the kosher status of a product."

Managers of two Canada Safeway stores only a few blocks away from the North and South End Supervalus offered mixed responses when asked about the demand for items stocked in their kosher food sections.

Mike Signore, manager of the Leila and McPhillips Safeway in the North End, said his store carries some such products.

"The market isn't as big as at one time," said Signore, noting that the section has been reduced in size.

Gerald Munch, manager of the Corydon Tuxedo Canada Safeway in the South End, however, said his store has "about 24 feet of nothing but kosher (or kosher-style) items, with well over 100 different products. There always has been a demand in our store," he said.

Jewish doctor facing charges in London synagogue arsons

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — A Jewish doctor has been charged with arson and attempted arson in connection with two deliberately set fires at synagogues here recently.

Jonathan Bishinsky, 38, a local doctor specializing in internal medicine, appeared in court last Friday in relation to fires set at two synagogues on Feb. 26 (CJN, March 5).

The charges came just days after Bishinsky was questioned by police in Phoenix, Ariz. in connection with a suspicious synagogue blaze there.

Bishinsky remains in custody. His case was adjourned last Friday so he could obtain legal counsel.

A former Montrealer, Bishinsky faces one count of arson related to a fire at the Orthodox Congregation Beth Tefilah, and one count of attempted arson in connection with a similar blaze at Congregation Or Shalom, a Conservative shul.

Damage in the fires is estimated at less than $500 but the incidents left many in London's 2,700-member Jewish community shaken.

"No, he's one of your own," Det.-Insp. David Lucio told The CJN when asked if London police are considering the fires as hate crimes.

A city-wide meeting of community and synagogue officials took place last week to review security at communal buildings.

Hillel Boroditsky, executive director of the London Jewish Federation, told The CJN that Bishinsky is a member of one of the two synagogues that were attacked, but declined to say which one.

Bishinsky was arrested two days after London firefighters extinguished a minor blaze outside Congregation Or Shalom. Moments later, they spotted smoke coming from Beth Tefilah synagogue, about a block away, and put out a fire there too.

The fire at Beth Tefilah scorched exterior walls and damaged a permanent sukkah.

At both scenes, officials found cardboard boxes containing paper, twigs and artificial fire logs.

In Phoenix a week earlier, Bishinsky was questioned in relation to a fire at the Orthodox Beth Joseph Congregation that caused over $3,000 in damage to prayer books and tallitot.

But as of last week, authorities in Phoenix considered Bishinsky an "investigative witness" and not a suspect.

Lucio said it's doubtful Bishinsky would face charges in the Phoenix fire because arson is not an extraditable offense.

Ottawa kosher food bank marks first anniversary

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — This month marks the first anniversary of the establishment of Ottawa's kosher food bank.

The need for such a service was discovered when Mark Zarecki arrived from Montreal to head up Ottawa's Jewish Family Services, and realized how many clients were hungry.

Within his first two days on the job, says Zarecki, "I met a poor Jewish man who told me he had not eaten for three days. I gave him part of my lunch."

This and other encounters convinced him that something had to be done. He spoke to Rabbi Arnold Fine of Congregation Agudath Israel and " told him that there was a real issue of poverty [in Ottawa] and it was not being addressed. There existed an opportunity for tikkun olam."

Clients cross all barriers

Rabbi Fine spoke to his synagogue's social action committee, which decided to establish a kosher food bank.

Co-chairs Rhoda Blevis and Jerry Penso, assisted by an army of volunteers, have accomplished a monumental feat in the past year. They have provided food for almost 350 families on both a regular and an emergency basis.

According to Penso, a retired grocer and now buyer for the food bank, the operation runs like clockwork. "The third Sunday of every month, we get a list from Jewish Family Services of the clients who require food. We have volunteer packers and volunteer drivers. Some clients pick up their food and others require delivery. We are able to serve them all."

In addition to the 83 families currently being assisted, the food bank provides emergency help when necessary. "For example," says Penso, "I recently received a call about a person who had been released from hospital and needed food, so I packed it up and took it over."

Special holiday packages have also been provided for Rosh Hashanah and Chanukah.

When asked about the clients, both Penso and Zarecki are quick to point out that they cross all barriers: singles and families, natives of Ottawa who have fallen on hard times as well as new immigrants, young and elderly.

Throughout the year, the other local synagogues have helped to publicize the kosher food bank and to collect food and donations from their congregants as well.

Penso emphasizes that most clients are anxious for the food bank to be a temporary part of their lives. Already, seven families have removed themselves from the list as they were able to become self-sufficient once again. The ultimate goal of the food bank is to become unnecessary.

Netanyahu warms to EU role in peace process

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

LONDON — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rejected British Prime Minister Tony Blair's suggestion last weekend that settlement activity be halted, but said he would welcome an increased role for the European Union (EU) in the Middle East peace process.

Meanwhile, Blair's office announced that he will visit the region next month, in Britain's capacity as rotating president of the EU.

On his way back from his trip to Western Europe Sunday night, Netanyahu said the Oslo accords do not bar the establishment of new settlements or the expansion of existing ones.

Netanyahu told Blair that he could not undertake "extraneous conditions" when the Palestinians are not fulfilling the obligations they undertook.

Foreign Secretary Robin Cook was reportedly eager to win acceptance of Great Britain's formula for making headway in the peace process. Sources estimated that the EU would endorse the proposal, but indicated that it is unacceptable to Israel.

David Bar-Illan, Netanyahu's director of communications, described the four-nation trip as "a reaffirmation of the prime minister's commitment to the Oslo accords."

He said the plans Netanyahu presented to his Spanish, German, Norwegian, and British hosts "were all in the framework of Oslo" and that he "has every intention of fulfilling them as long as the Palestinians fulfil their commitments."

Official sources said some American officials may resent "Netanyahu's success" in dealing with the Europeans, a reference to reports that officials around Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said Netanyahu's European swing was meant to distract attention from the stalled Palestinian track.

They said Palestinian spokespersons have been making "almost identical allegations," which, they added, have been vehemently denied by Israeli officials.

During their meeting, Blair told Netanyahu that he sees an "urgent need" for progress in the peace process, especially on the issue of redeployment, according to a Downing Street spokesperson. The meeting was described as friendly and constructive.

"We want to move with the Palestinians and we want to withdraw from Lebanon," Netanyahu told reporters after the meeting. Asked for more details about the talks, Netanyahu said that those would be "best left on a confidential basis to see if we can proceed with them."

Netanyahu sought support for security arrangements with the Palestinians and for Israel's plan to withdraw from Lebanon, but the British side, which included EU peace envoy Miguel Moratinos, was not ready to be drawn into such decisions.

Instead, it was determined to focus attention on an enhanced EU role in peace diplomacy – at least with the Palestinians – and the implementation of Israel's existing commitments.

These include the lifting of restrictions on Palestinians seeking to work in Israel, the creation of industrial zones in Gaza, the establishment of a seaport and an airport for Gaza, and the creation of a "safe passage" route between the West Bank and Gaza. Also on the agenda were what the British described as "substantial, credible and urgent further redeployments" in the West Bank and a halt to "all expansion of settlements."

British officials expressed their concern over falling Palestinian living standards caused by closure and the limited effect of EU aid as a result of what they perceive to be Israeli-imposed obstacles to economic development of the Palestinian-controlled areas.

Significance was attached to Blair's warm greeting when he met Netanyahu on the steps of 10 Downing Street and his relatively curt farewell, which saw Blair turn sharply on his heel and leave Netanyahu in the bitingly cold late afternoon to field questions alone from the press. Nonetheless, the Downing Street spokesperson said after the meeting that "Prime Minister Netanyahu looks forward to welcoming [Blair] when he visits the Middle East shortly after Easter."

The spokesperson said Blair would visit other Middle Eastern countries during his trip.

Cook plans a trip to the region next week. He is to visit Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian areas, Israel, Syria and Lebanon.

Meanwhile, in other related developments, Palestinian Authority (PA) officials rejected Netanyahu's proposal to meet with Arafat, saying nothing would be achieved at such a meeting. Other officials charged Netanyahu's proposal is a mere exercise in public relations.

PA Minister of International Cooperation Nabil Shaath said that before such a meeting can take place, Netanyahu must commit himself to carrying out redeployment in the West Bank according to the agreement.

Jordan ties improving: Sharon

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

AMMAN — Israel's recently strained relations with Jordan are rapidly improving, National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon said following meetings with King Hussein and Crown Prince Hassan.

Sharon's visit to Amman was the first by an Israeli minister since the Ciechanover Report on the botched attempt to assassinate Hamas leader Khaled Meshal came out last month.

Sharon said that "the problem has gone. The desire of Jordan is to push ahead to reach as wide as possible cooperation in the region."

The countries agreed to press ahead with a series of bilateral projects, including improving Israeli water supply to Jordan and the construction of a canal to pump water from the Gulf of Eilat to the Dead Sea to generate electricity.

In a joint statement, Hussein stressed "the importance of implementing issues agreed upon between the two sides in preparation for entering into negotiations regarding final status on the way toward achieving a just, durable, and comprehensive peace."

Turning to the Palestinian issue, Sharon told reporters that "talk of a freeze in relations with the Palestinian Authority is exaggerated. There is a preparedness on Israel's part to push ahead with peace. In recent days there may have been a slowdown because of Palestinian hopes for a U.S. program or maybe U.S. pressure. I don't believe that pressure will come from the United States."

The meeting between Sharon and Hussein lasted 90 minutes, with the two speaking alone for almost an hour.

Syria, Lebanon reject Israel's withdrawal proposal

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Syria and Lebanon have rejected Israel's initiative for a withdrawal of IDF troops from south Lebanon, Radio Beirut announced last week.

The statement, which followed a meeting between Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and Syrian Vice President Abdel Halim Khadam in Damascus, said they would not accept anything less than Israel's withdrawal from both south Lebanon and the Golan Heights.

They said in both cases UN Security Council Resolution 425 stipulates an unconditional Israeli pull-out and is not negotiable.

Support for their position also came from Russia, whose Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov told his Syrian counterpart Farouk Shara that he backs parallel Israeli pullbacks from south Lebanon and the Golan Heights, a Syrian official said.

He said Primakov's views were contained in a message conveyed to Shara by Russian Ambassador to Damascus Viktor Gogitidze during a recent meeting.

"Mr. Primakov expressed his country's belief that any attempt to separate the Syrian and Lebanese tracks [in peace negotiations] will fail," the official said. "[Primakov] affirmed that the only realistic way is to have a parallel Israeli pullback from south Lebanon and the Golan, in compliance with what was reached during talks between the Syrian and Israeli sides in the previous negotiations," he added.

Visiting Oslo, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reiterated Israel's willingness to withdraw from southern Lebanon if the Lebanese army can ensure the dismantling of Hezbollah.

Deputy Prime Minister Moshe Katsav said that "if Lebanon would maintain quiet on its border with Israel, as Syria does, Israel would leave Lebanon."

Israel "can envisage a redeployment of troops from Lebanon, but only without the threat of terrorism along the border," Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai told a news conference at the French Foreign Ministry in Paris.

Coming out of a 45-minute meeting with Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine, Mordechai also said Israel hoped to re-establish dialogue with Syria, which virtually controls Lebanese affairs.

Mordechai, who also met with French Defence Minister Alain Richard, said Israel seeks three objectives before carrying out the UN resolution calling for an Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon: the "sovereignty of the Lebanese people," alluding to the Syrian influence; peace on both sides of the border; and elimination of the terrorist threat.

"If they can guarantee peace and security, we can retreat," he told journalists, referring to Lebanon and Syria. "If not, we have to assure our security by continuing to fight in southern Lebanon."

French officials said Vedrine pledged to help facilitate contacts among all parties, but gave no details. Mordechai, who said he was "very pleased" with his talks with Vedrine, said the two ministers had also discussed options for peace with him, but also gave no details.

Analysts in Paris said Mordechai wanted to speak to the French, because Paris is on record as saying it is prepared to provide security guarantees between Israel and Lebanon. Defence Ministry officials pointed out that French troops are in the area as part of the United Nations UNIFIL force.

Mordechai said the French showed interest. "I hope it advances things, but we shouldn't have any illusions. We will need to deal with the problem of south Lebanon for a long time," he said in an interview with Channel 2.

Mordechai also reiterated his call to Syria to renew peace negotiations, and said the current efforts to come to an arrangement with Lebanon are not an attempt to write Syria out of the picture.

"The efforts being made regarding Lebanon do not come to bypass Damascus, but to pave the way [to] discussions with Damascus by finding cooperative solutions in Lebanon," Mordechai said. "I am completely convinced that if we come to a solution regarding Lebanon, then it will advance the process with the Syrians."

Mossad gets new chief

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The newly appointed head of Mossad will have some daunting work ahead of him.

Ephraim Halevy, a former deputy head of the foreign intelligence service, will oversee an overhaul of the organization.

Mossad's vaunted image has been tarnished over the past several months, which saw the bungled attempt last September on the life of a Hamas leader in Jordan, the arrest of a senior Mossad officer suspected of feeding false information to his superiors, and a botched bugging attempt last month in Switzerland that led to the arrest of a Mossad agent.

Along with announcing Halevy's appointment, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu also named Maj. Gen. Amiram Levine, head of the Israel Defence Force northern command, to serve as Mossad's deputy director.

The premier acknowledged that there had been damage to the agency as a result of recent "malfunctions" as well as "unnecessary and irresponsible" leaks to the media.

Halevy, who enjoys a good relationship with Jordan's King Hussein, helped restore ties between the two countries after a botched Mossad assassination attempt on Jordanian soil last September threatened Israeli-Jordanian relations.

The failed attempt on a Hamas leader in Jordan was a major factor in Danny Yatom's recent decision to resign from Mossad.

The Week in Israel

March 2

• The Jewish population in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip increased by nine percent in 1997 according to the Interior Ministry. A spokesperson of the ministry said there are now 161,000 Jews there and attributed the increased number to a high birth rate.

March 3

• Jordan's King Hussein called for renewed security cooperation with Israel after Mossad head Danny Yatom resigned, according to Israeli media. King Hussein had ended the security cooperation after Mossad launched a failed attempt last September to assassinate a Hamas leader on Jordanian soil.

March 4

• Israeli President Ezer Weizman was re-elected by the Knesset for a second five-year term, heading off a challenge from Likud MK Shaul Amor. In a secret ballot, Weizman garnered 63 votes to Amor's 49, with seven abstentions. Weizman will be formally sworn in on May 18.

March 5

• Security forces uncovered a terrorist network from the Ramallah, Nablus and Jerusalem areas that was involved in two suicide bombings last year.

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived in Madrid for a European tour that will also take him to Germany, Norway and Britain. The main agenda item is the stalled peace process with the Palestinian Authority (PA).

March 6

Rebuilding the Mossad

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Ephraim Halevy, the new head of the Mossad, has his work cut out for him. Appointed last week to replace the disgraced Danny Yatom, who resigned following a series of embarrassing mishaps, Halevy's mandate is to rebuild the morale of a spy agency whose image has been badly tarnished of late.

Ephraim Halevy

Yatom, the shortest serving Mossad chieftain and the first one in more than 30 years to quit, tendered his resignation in the wake of bungled operations in Jordan and Switzerland and the disclosure that an agent had fed the Mossad false information about Syria.

Dissatisfaction with Yatom initially bubbled to the surface after it was disclosed that Yehuda Gil, a senior agent, had deliberately misled the Mossad with respect to Syria's policy toward Israel. The grumbling intensified when Mossad agents with doctored Canadian passports failed to assassinate Khaled Meshal, a top Hamas official, in Amman. This incident caused a crisis in relations with Jordan and prompted Canada to recall its ambassador in Tel Aviv.

Although an Israeli commission investigating the fiasco concluded that Yatom had "erred in his handling of the operation," Yatom refused to resign. Last month, he finally stepped down, forced out by a leak that Mossad operatives in Bern had been caught redhanded trying to bug the house of a Lebanese businessman close to Hezbollah. By all accounts, the news was leaked to the Israeli press by disgruntled Mossad officials whose overriding goal was to push out Yatom.

Though Yatom left the agency under a dark cloud, this was not the first time the Mossad had been subjected to such scrutiny. Like all foreign intelligence services, it has compiled a mixed record since its formation in 1951.

Its public accomplishments are well known. It kidnapped Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann in Argentina. It launched a campaign of intimidation against German rocket scientists in Egypt, but the operation resulted in the resignation of its director, Isser Harel. The Mossad also recruited two Arab pilots, the Iraqi Munir Redfa and the Syrian Mohammed Bassam Adel, who flew their advanced MiGs to Israel.

The agency played an integral role in the " hijacking" of missile boats the French government should have sent but did not deliver to Israel, and in the decision of a Swiss engineer, Alfred Frauenknecht, to supply Israel with Mirage jet blueprints.

The Mossad laid the groundwork for the mass movements of Jewish immigrants from Yemen, Morocco and Ethiopia, carried out the assassinations of Palestinian leaders, brought atomic whistle blower Mordecai Vanunu back to Israel, and had a hand in the Entebbe raid.

Arguably, the Mossad's greatest agents were Eli Cohen and Wolfgang Lotz. The information they relayed from their posts in Syria and Egypt was used by the Israeli armed forces to capture the Golan Heights and the Sinai Peninsula in the Six Day War.

Alongside these achievements are egregious setbacks.

The Mossad, in a bid to forestall Britain's planned withdrawal from the Suez Canal, staged a series of bombings of British and American institutions in Egypt. The plot backfired, leading to the arrests of Egyptian Jews and sparking the Lavon affair in Israel.

The Mossad took part in the abduction of a Moroccan dissident, Mehdi Ben-Barka, and the incident triggered recriminations between Israel and France. In Lillehammer, Norway, the Mossad killed a Moroccan waiter mistaken for a top PLO official. Members of the hit team were arrested, tried and imprisoned.

In addition to these slips, the Mossad blundered by misreading Egyptian and Syrian intentions before the Yom Kippur War, by encouraging Israel to intercept a Libyan plane believed to be carrying George Habash and Ahmed Jebril, by botching an operation against Iran's embassy in Cyprus, and by mishandling the case of a double agent in Britain.

Clearly, the Mossad is a sharp but imperfect instrument.

News story exposes deep ideological conflicts

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Opinion

It's a tale that, on the face of it, has all the trappings of a good – a really good – newspaper story. Forget a newspaper story, it would make a great novel. Foreign workers rape a haredi woman, the mother of nine children, as she leaves a mikvah. She and her husband are deeply in love, but because of the Laws of Moses, the rabbis decree that he must divorce her. The reason: The husband is a kohen, descendant of the priestly caste, and the wife of a kohen is forbidden to him if she has been violated.

The story was told in Yediot Achronot two weeks ago, and then picked up by all the major media. The radio talk shows had a field day, the newspapers did follow ups, the story even hit the international wires. The only problem is that it appears now, two weeks after publication, that the whole thing never happened. A number of people went searching for the woman, the children, the foreign rapists, the rabbis. Nobody found anything. Yediot has said it is investigating the matter.

Perhaps the reporter fell victim to wild rumors being spread about foreign workers; perhaps the country fell victim to shoddy journalism, and a penchant to believe the worst about the Haredim.

According to noted Jewish philosopher Eliezer Schweid, the whole episode puts into context the fundamental gap separating the religious and non-religious communities. That so many people were willing to believe the story, even though it was poorly sourced from the beginning, is "not necessarily the result of negative attitudes toward the Haredim," Schweid argued. "You can't deny that the stands taken by the haredi leadership on these issues – the status of women – provide a background that enables people to believe this type of thing."

Schweid said that the lack of knowledge in the wider public of the halachic norms in these areas, coupled by an underlying antagonism toward the rabbinic establishment for its stand on issues over which it has sole control – marriage and divorce – makes people more willing to buy these stories.

A few days after the story broke, a demonstration was organized in front of the Tel Aviv rabbinate, with signs reading "Don't rape her again, Halachah against women, Medieval darkness," and "Is being raped a crime." One of the demonstrators, Yael Doron of the Rape Crisis Centre, said that even though the incident in question may have been made up, "Don't make the rabbinate into pure righteous people, because they are not. Maybe this specific incident did not happen, but that doesn't meant they are clean. They have done enough bad things."

According to Schweid, friction over matters of personal status and sexual ethics is one of the most difficult points of contention between the religious and non-religious communities. "The law has given the rabbinate authority over these issues, and the rabbinate doesn't try to solve the problems that arise in a manner that is compatible with the ethical standards of the majority of the non-religious public. There is a deep conflict on this, and it touches especially on the status of women. The conventional wisdom is that the halachic stands taken by the rabbinate discriminate against women. It is against the backdrop of this sensitivity that you can understand why people are willing to easily believe these stories."

Interestingly enough, Rabbi Shmuel Jakobovits, head of Ura Kevodi, an organization of haredi intellectuals set up to clarify haredi stands on contemporary issues, said that although the Yediot story may or may not be true, it does reflect a genuine aspect of the clash between the religious and non-religious cultures and ideologies.

"It may be that this particular instance was fabricated, but there is something here that is a matter of conflict," Rabbi Jakobovits said. "According to the Torah, a kohen is not allowed to continue to live with his wife if she was raped. What we really have here is a deep conflict between two ideologies.

"The papers and media play it up, because they are eager to show that in the perspective of modern, universalist, human values, there are elements in Torah ideology that are – to their minds – unacceptable. But I say it is specifically issues such as these that are litmus tests of our faith, and of our belief in Torah from heaven."

He said that accepting painful decrees such as these is a "sign of acceptance of the heavenly law." Rabbi Jakobovits said that although the particular incident may not have happened, "it could happen." He said there are other factors that could come into play that would lead to a more lenient opinion by the rabbinical courts, "and there may very well be only a few instances where this [halachic] principle will be applied. But the principle is there.

"The real issue at hand in Israeli society is the principle, not the actual incident. That is the central issue facing us today – that one side views Torah as supreme and unassailable, while the other side believes that universal values are superior."

Maccabi investigation urged

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Roy Salomon

TORONTO — Two Australian community organizations are calling on the Israeli Knesset to establish an independent committee to investigate all aspects of the 15th Maccabiah Games.

Establishing that sort of committee is "the only course of action that can lead to a healing," say the presidents of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) and the Zionist Federation of Australia (ZFA).

In a letter to Dan Tichon, speaker of the Knesset, the presidents of the two umbrella organizations say a rift has developed between Australian Jewry and Israel over the collapse of a bridge and the deaths of four Australian athletes at the opening ceremonies of last summer's Maccabiah Games.

"This rift has not healed," write ECAJ president Diane Shteinman and ZFA president Ron Weiser.

"One outstanding issue, which does not appear to be in the process of resolution, is the call for the establishment of an inquiry into the conduct of the organizers of the 15th Maccabiah which is both truly independent and seen to be truly independent," they state.

"Despite the [Israeli government's] Dotan report, subsequent police investigations and indictments which have dealt with infringement of the law, there has yet to be proper scrutiny of the actual organization and conduct of the 15th Maccabiah."

The letter to the Knesset came about two weeks after a high-powered delegation of officials from the Maccabi World Union (MWU) travelled to Australia in a bid to address the Jewish community's concerns. They held two public meetings in which they fielded heated questions from Australian Jews and met with officials of Maccabi Australia; some in the delegation met with family members of some of the athletes.

They also agreed to expand an internal MWU three-person investigation by adding three additional nominees suggested by Maccabi Australia.

Responding to that development, Shteinman and Weiser stated in their letter: "We do not doubt that the individuals on the [MWU] commission...are eminent people, but the fact that they held positions within MWU is an impediment to justice being perceived to have been done."

Maccabi Canada President Roy Salomon, who was part of the MWU delegation to Australia, said he is confident the internal Maccabi investigation would be "full and independent" and would look at both the bridge collapse and also "the inner workings of MWU."

"We have supreme confidence that we did the right thing...We certainly have nothing to hide" from a Knesset investigation, Salomon added.

The MWU accomplished its goals in Australia, he continued. It explained the organization's position to the Jewish community, it expressed regrets for the tragedy and it worked out a compromise with Maccabi Australia that will see it remain part of the international Maccabi family while its executives remain affiliated with MWU.

Canadian mission visits Israel

By REUVEN ROSENFELDER
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — It was Friday afternoon before Shabbat. People were doing their last-minute shopping at the busy Machane Yehuda in Jerusalem when members of the Canadian Mission 98-Israel at 50 visited the market.

"Are you the Canadian group?" asked one Jerusalemite carrying bags filled with fruits and vegetables. "You don't know how much your being here means to us!"

A total of 250 mission participants from across Canada came to Israel last week, just as the agreement between Iraq and UN secretary general Kofi Annan was being worked out. One hundred and fifty came from Toronto, 57 from Montreal, 18 from Calgary and the rest from communities from Halifax to Vancouver.

"Given the tension in the Middle East when people departed for this mission, it was heartening to see how many people came despite the political circumstances, which were far from clear," said Steve Ain, executive vice-president of the United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA), which organized the mission.

"We had planned it as a celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary," Ain said. "In light of the circumstances, it turned out to be both in celebration and in solidarity with the people of Israel."

The emphasis of the week-long program was on seeing the direct involvement of the Canadian Jewish community in the development of the country through Canadian projects.

"We were able to show the Canadians what their contributions meant in improving the quality of life of ordinary Israelis, especially in the peripheral regions of the Galilee and the Negev," said Harvey Wolfe of Montreal, president of UIA.

A couple of days after the mission's visit to Canada Centre in Metulla near Israel's border with Lebanon, three Israeli soldiers were killed in a Hezbollah shelling of the area known as the security zone, just north of Metulla.

"It made people understand the difference between our lives in Canada and the condition of Israelis, who must lay their own lives on the line," said Sandy Brown, who chairs the mission's Toronto contingent.

In the town of Yeruham in the Negev, the Montreal contingent, chaired by Etty Bienstock and Elliot Lifson, marked 15 years of Montreal's involvement in the town's development, which began with Project Renewal in the 1980s. A number of key projects, including a public library, a sports centre and a club for the elderly, were built by Montreal in Yeruham. Today these are an essential part of the lives of the residents.

The Toronto leadership, involved in Eilat and the region of Eilot in the southern end of the country, got an in-depth view of the results of their efforts in the Partnership 2000 program, which unites Canadian and Israeli communities in cooperative projects.

In Beersheva, the mission visited a cultural centre established by Keren Hayesod especially for the city's large Ethiopian community.

In Jerusalem, the group attended a special presentation held at the Academy of Arts and Science, a major high school that the UIA of Canada helped build. It included a performance by the Yovel group of singers, scheduled to visit Canada later this year as part of Israel's Jubilee celebrations. Canadian Ambassador David Berger praised the Jewish communities for their work.

Jewish ethics, Alzheimer discussed at conference

By LORI EPPSTEIN
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Alzheimer disease can force Jews to re-examine the most fundamental principles of their faith.

Take the case of Jay Luxembourg's grandmother, who three years ago had a stroke that rendered her mute. His grandfather, who has an advancing case of Alzheimer disease, would forget that his wife couldn't speak, get upset when she didn't answer him and try to hit her.

Even though Luxembourg's parents had promised the grandparents never to separate them, and though the Torah commands Jews to honor their father and mother, the family put Luxembourg's grandfather into a home.

Luxembourg, a doctor at the Jewish Home for the Aged in San Francisco, recently shared his family's predicament with other doctors and medical students at the ninth annual International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics in Burlingame, Calif. His story presents one of many ethical dilemmas that accompany Alzheimer cases.

Luxembourg, a geriatric specialist, was no stranger to such dilemmas when his family predicament arose. He has grappled for years with the care of Alzheimer patients at the Home. Most families learn about coping with the disease the harder way – one day at a time.

With diminishing mental capacity, patients can become not only disoriented, but demanding, psychotic and even violent, placing severe stress on family and caregivers.

Unfortunately, there is little guidance in the Torah or the Talmud specific to Alzheimer disease. But Orthodox Rabbi Moshe Tendler, an expert in medical ethics and a professor at Yeshiva University in New York, has gleaned some principles from halachic teachings, which he shared with the audience of some 200 doctors.

Tendler prefaced his talk with common-sense advice. He urged individuals in the early stages of the disease to sign a power-of-attorney contract giving another family member the right to make future medical and legal decisions for them.

Alzheimer disease can also have a deleterious effect on the caregiver, particularly when the patient no longer recognizes a partner. For this reason, Tendler suggests writing a religious contract that would grant a future divorce at the point when three experts, usually doctors and rabbis, conclude that the patient is no longer competent. At that point, the marriage would be dissolved retroactively to the date the contract was written. In such a situation, an infidelity committed after the contract was written would not be considered adultery.

Honoring parents

When the patient – usually, a parent – is at the point that he or she needs extra care, Tendler said, the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother" is the best advice.

In practice, this means that the adult children care for and house an ailing parent until the parent's condition deteriorates to the point that the son or daughter can no longer honor them in a dignified manner. At such a point, Tendler explained, it would be best to send the parent to a nursing home.

But "parents cannot be shunted off until [their condition] becomes literally unbearable."

Jewish law does not require a person to pay for his or her parents' convalescent needs. The Torah maintains that "payment for the father's care must come from his estate." However, that doesn't mean that one should not help financially with a relative's medical needs. But such cases constitute charity, which is another matter, Tendler said.

When it comes to difficult medical decisions, such as withholding therapy required to maintain longevity, the rabbi stressed that the primary consideration is sanctity of human life.

Doctors can prolong the mental functioning of a patient with Alzheimer disease by using estrogen, but such treatment raises an ethical question even Tendler couldn't answer: "Do you stop estrogen at the point [where it no longer helps] and allow the natural process [of dying]?"

Halachah does not require prolonging a patient's life by unnatural means such as using life-support systems, he explained. At the same time, life should be preserved aggressively until the individual can no longer survive on his or her own.

If a patient loses interest in living, Halachah is very clear that it is the family or doctor's responsibility to intervene, Tendler said.

"An Alzheimer patient may have lost competence, but they have not lost humanhood."

Also speaking at the conference sponsored by Hebrew Academy of San Francisco was Vernon Neppe, director of the Pacific Neuropsychiatric Institute in Seattle. He presented findings that suggest Alzheimer disease will become more common as human survival rates advance. Currently, one in nine people over the age of 65 has the disease. By 2030, that figure could be one in five.

The good news, he said, is that "the later one develops the disease, the milder will be the case."

Panel speaker Allen Roses, a genetics researcher who specializes in muscular dystrophy and Alzheimer, suggested that researchers are fast approaching the ability to definitively predict a future Alzheimer case as well as the age of onset.

The greater challenge, Roses said, will be to persuade a major drug company to sponsor research for a cure.

Transfer concerns JGH

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) said it is reassured that Jewish long-term care patients who were expecting to be placed at Maimonides Hospital Geriatric Centre and suddenly were told they would be going to Chateau Westmount will receive the level of care they need, as well as have their cultural and religious needs respected.

The 35 beds expected to be reopened at Maimonides were reduced to 22 when the Montreal regional health board, acting on a government decree, told the JGH on Feb. 27 that 13 of the 35 frail elderly patients had to be sent to Chateau Westmount by the following Monday. The switch took place because Maimonides had at that point hired only enough additional staff to handle 22 new patients, expecting that most of the 35 would be transferred between March 6 and 22.

Neither hospital is clear as to what the rush was about. Health Minister Jean Rochon announced last month that 200 chronic-care beds would be reopened immediately in the Montreal area, including the 35 at Maimonides, to ease emergency room overcrowding. Apparently, that plan was not being carried out as quickly as foreseen.

The JGH raised concerns about the government's haste, but disagreed with the head of its nurses' union, Naomi Chemtob, who warned that the transferred patients will not get the level of nursing care they need at Chateau Westmount. One relative of a patient also complained to The CJN that she was not confident that Chateau Westmount could provide strictly kosher food.

JGH spokesperson Betty Rozovsky said the hospital is satisfied by assurances from both the regional health board and Chateau Westmount that it will increase its staffing to the extent necessary, as well as arrange to provide kosher meals, although it does not have a kosher kitchen.

"We would like to clarify that we never criticized Chateau Westmount," Rozovsky said. "We did not object to the patients going there...It's an excellent nursing home, and they have been extremely cooperative and pleasant in doing whatever is necessary to provide appropriate care. From the families of those transferred, we have received nothing but excellent reports."

Sherman opus mirrors unfeeling, dog-eat-dog world

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The anti-hero of Jason Sherman's play, Patience, is a Jewish businessman so brutal and shallow that he is not credible.

The 35-year-old Toronto Jewish playwright, one of eight brothers, has given us a story about a tycoon whose world falls apart. He realizes finally that he has used people as if they were disposable. He lives high and acts low.

Sherman chooses to make Reuben Field Jewish, but the world he inhabits and the phony friends around him are not Jewish.

The questions Field asks about where and why he went wrong are universal. The philosophic underpinning of Patience is strong. The theory of chaos and and the principle of uncertainty are well explored.

But too much of the play is dependent on the Jewish milieu for which Sherman has a keen eye and ear and this reviewer is left wondering if that is why it has reached the main stage at Tarragon Theatre, where it runs until April 5. In the '90s, apparently, Jewish villains and jokes are good box office.

As Reuben Field says about his late brother Johnny, "I loved him, I just didn't like being around him."

If you can overlook, or at least live with, the Jewish angle, then Patience is worth seeing. It would be just as relevant, if not more so, if the anti-hero was a non-Jew.

It mirrors an unfeeling, dog-eat-dog world. The opening "killer squash" game in which Reuben (Peter Hutt) slams out a win against business partner Peter (Diego Matamoros) is brilliantly staged and nicely prepares the way for Reuben's comeuppance at Peter's hands when his big Korea deal for cellular phones falls through.

Reuben's wife Donna (Susan Coyne) leaves him when she discovers love letters to Sarah (Sarah Orenstein), the wife of an old friend of Reuben, and she takes their two children to her mother.

The old friend, Paul, (Richard Waugh) in fact plays a crucial role, making a ghostly visit from a plane crash death to warn Reuben that a dire fate awaits him.

Reuben's attempts to reignite his affair with Sarah are sidetracked when he meets a perky 19-year-old college student Liz (Leah Salomaa) for whom his professor brother Phil has ditched his wife of 20 years.

Liz seems to know the answers Reuben is searching for, but the former tycoon warns her away from any relationship. He also discovers that Sarah can be as ruthless in business as he once was and decides he doesn't want that life again. When the play ends, Reuben is in limbo.

Playing a second part as Reuben's brother Phil, Matamoros walks off with the best acting honors as a jogging academic. ("I didn't know you and Spandex had such a close relationship," Reuben says.)

To hear and see Phil hobble around after an exhausting run and rationalize an affair with one of his students (he later falls for a mature woman) is worth the price of admission.

Sherman's talent for dialogue is such that he can go beyond Neil Simon's penchant for one-liners in Jewish comedy, and under Ian Prinsloo's direction, Matamoros makes it all come alive.

The set designed by Dany Lyne is an ingenious one, including a square box that becomes a car loaded with electronic gadgets, a boardroom and other settings in Toronto.

Films of Jewish interest at Hot Docs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Films of Jewish interest from Germany and Israel will be screened at next week's fifth annual Canadian International Documentary Film Festival (Hot Docs).

Running from March 18 to 22, the festival will take place at the Metropolitan Hotel and the Carlton Cinema.

Jeckes, directed by Jens Meurer, is about Jews from Germany who settled in Palestine after the rise of Nazism and World War II. The focus is on seven individuals – four women and three men – who reinvented themselves in their adopted land.

Forming the Fifth Aliyah, these Jewish immigrants were regarded with a mixture of respect and bemusement. They were orderly, punctual, regimented, well educated, cultured and hard working. They stood out in a crowd. For all these reasons, some people thought they were a little eccentric, if not strange.

We meet Paul Jacobi, a charming man who was once deputy mayor of Jerusalem; Gitta Sherover, a sardonic patron of the arts; Anna Maria Jokl, a psychoanalyst who used to be a screenwriter; Dr. Elly Freund, who thinks she was the last Jew to write a medical exam in Nazi Germany; Steff Wertheimer, a visionary industrialist; Naomi Frankel, a former Marxist who's now an Orthodox resident of Hebron; and Michael Smuss, an artist who survived the Warsaw ghetto and the Majdanek concentration camp.

They all have something noteworthy to say in this informative, nostalgic and surprisingly amusing film.

Kinderland, Cinderland, by Sibylle Tiedmann and Ute Badura, poignantly tells the story of a group of schoolgirls in a southern German town during the Third Reich whom fate dealt diametrically different hands.

Feeling the hot blast of anti-Semitism, the Jewish students were expelled from regular classes, socially ostracized and ultimately forced to leave Ulm with their families. As this tragedy developed, virtually all the Christian girls had the time of their lives in a reborn country that exalted Aryan womanhood and mercilessly crushed dissent.

Looking back, one Christian woman says she deplored Kristallnacht, but only in private. Having been brainwashed, she admits that her view of Jews was less than fair. "No one opened their mouths," observes another woman, referring to the blatant injustices of the day. Survival was the name of the game.

Interestingly enough, they express shock that one of their contemporaries from Ulm, the legendary Sophie Scholl, joined the anti-Nazi White Rose resistance movement. Recalling World War II, they acknowledge that they eventually perceived it as a struggle to preserve Germany rather than as a war of aggression.

A Letter Without Words, by Lisa Lewenz, is a touching film about cultural loss and reclamation. In 1981, Lisa Lewenz – an American graduate student brought up as an Episcopalian – stumbled upon a treasure trove of home movies shot by her late grandmother, Ella Arnhold, an assimilated, upper middle class German Jew who was camera crazy.

The discovery was a revelation and a genuine turning point. Apart from encouraging Lewenz to find out more about Ella and to investigate her family's history, Ella's amateur films of Germany from the end of World War I to the rise of Hitler gave her a better appreciation of her father, Hans Wolfgang, who converted to Christianity shortly after his arrival in the United States from Nazi Germany.

All in all, A Letter Without Words is an honest and disarming film.

Stefan Zwieg, the Austrian Jewish novelist, was a man of the world, an idealistic cosmopolitan whose scorn for nationalism was reflected in his books. Hounded out of Austria, he immigrated to Britain, then to the United States and, finally, to Brazil, where he committed suicide.

Three Lives – Friderike, Lotte and Stefan Zwieg recreates the last 10 years of his life, as well as his crumbling marriage and love affair with his literary secretary. Stylistically, the film breaks new ground, inasmuch as it unfolds against a contemporary backdrop, with actors playing the roles of the protagonists.

The directors, Wilma Kiener and Dieter Matzka, make two telling points. Despite a friendship with Theodor Herzl, Zwieg was resistant to Zionism, believing it was just another form of nationalism. And though he was a non-practising Jew, he was Jewish in the sense that he worked for international understanding and brotherhood. Sadly, these values exploded in his face with the emergence of Hitler, the swallowing up of Austria by Germany and the outbreak of World War II.

Dan Katzir's Out for Love...Be Back Shortly is a hybrid of a movie. It's a self-indulgent romance with a happy ending, a grim commentary on the residual effects of terrorism on Israel, and a sober look at Israel's fierce political divisions.

As Katzir – nephew of a former Israeli president – pursues Iris, a comely farm girl, terrorist bombs go off in Tel Aviv and opponents of the Oslo peace process and of Yitzhak Rabin take to the streets in bitter demonstrations. "So much hate, so little love," Katzir comments. These words, as well as his quirky film, speak volumes.

CANADIAN WRITER TO WRITE HOLOCAUST PLAY

A New York-based committee attached to the YIVO Institute of Jewish Research has commissioned award-winning Canadian playwright Y. V. (Victoria) Keidan to write a stage play about the Epstein Gymnasium, a progressive academy of higher learning in Vilna between the wars, where Jews of both sexes were permitted to study secular subjects in the Polish language.

The play would draw material from The Way We Were Before Our Destruction, a non-fiction book by Dr. Yulian Rafes that YIVO co-published several months ago. The book describes the happy-go-lucky lives of the school's 400 students, many of whom eventually perished in the Holocaust.

Keidan, 37, is an astonishingly prolific playwright who lives in Alliston, Ont., a town north of Toronto. The CJN reached her in New York the day after she attended a reception for survivors who had attended the Epstein Gymnasium in its prime.

Keidan took up the theatrical craft in 1993, and has already written 12 plays and seen 15 productions of her works on stage. Four of her plays have been published. Last year, she won the Canadian Jewish Playwrighting Competition for her play Bitter Apples.

A production of one of her plays, The Pit, opens in May at the Storefront Theatre in Alliston. The Pit is a play about the Holocaust and about survivors, a subject Keidan knows something about, since her parents are survivors from Poland.

The committee "chose me based upon the writing in The Pit," she said.

"They apparently thought the writing was honest and true; they actually thought I was a survivor. They didn't think a younger person could write this way."

Keidan and the committee, which consists of Rafes and others who had attended the Epstein Gymnasium, hope to mount a production of the as-yet-to-be-written play on Broadway, Keidan said.

Here's how American writer Cynthia Ozick replied to that question in a recent interview: "I don't agree with the sentiment, 'Write what you know.' That recommends circumscription. I think one should write what one doesn't know. The world is bigger and wider and more complex than our small subjective selves. One should prod, goad the imagination. That's what it's there for."

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

NEW HOPE FOR THE DEAD

The late afternoon sun had burnished Masada's rocky landscape to a deep-hued sandy gold and lent startling drama to the purple-gray clouds rolling over the vast Judean wilderness.

As viewed from atop the windy massif, the southern shores of the Dead Sea seemed veiled in a fine turquoise-lavender mist, cloaking its rugged beauty as well as its sinful past as the site of the notorious biblical cities of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Like most visitors to Masada, we trekked through the ruins of Herod's former palace, stared down at the Roman encampments and ramparts, and reacquainted ourselves with Josephus' apparently highly accurate account of the tragedy that occurred on this isolated mountaintop in 73 CE.

The story of Masada has become an inextricable part of modern Israeli mythology. Here, the last Jewish stronghold fell, choosing mass suicide rather than slaughter by Caesar's helmeted hordes. Herod's palace is near to dust, yet the tale survives, moving hearts afresh with each telling.

Cutting through the air like an eagle, the cable car glided downwards, reaching the bottom in minutes instead of the hours it would have taken by foot along the serpentine Snake Path. From above, the Dead Sea had seemed only a short ride away. But it seemed to take hours to reach the welcoming resort hotels on its shores.

Some members of our group refreshed in the spa, while others took mud-faced beauty treatments, submerged in natural sulphur springs, or indulged in the cliché of reading a newspaper while afloat in the lake's "heavy" water.

Saturated with minerals including bromides and other healthful healing elements, the Dead Sea is so rich with chemicals that it is being systematically mined and the chemicals exported to China and other countries.

The lowest region on earth, the Dead Sea area is about five times lower than California's Death Valley, the lowest point in North America. Because the air is so dense, the lungs take in substantially more oxygen with every breath. However, because the air is so dry, the pores release huge amounts of moisture. One must drink almost constantly or suffer the effects of dehydration.

After dinner, we visited Beit Ha' Yotzir (the Dead Sea Museum), where director Shlomo Drori showed us charts and aerial photographs that clearly illustrated the Dead Sea's plight: Fed only by the Jordan River, its shallow southern basin is receding by an average of 90 centimetres per year and its water level has dropped nine metres in recent decades. The Jordan has been increasingly diverted in recent years to quench the thirst of the growing populations of both Israel and Jordan.

A dynamic octogenarian who is well-known in Israel, Drori is both a visionary and a dreamer, someone who dares to believe that political problems can be solved and that people can accomplish great things.

He is a proponent of the so-called Red-Dead canal, a technological megaproject that both the Israelis and the Jordanians have already approved in principle.

"This canal will become the boundary between the two countries, but it would not divide them, it would connect them," he said.

A massive canal from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea could replenish the receding waters of the Dead Sea. Since the water would drop about 1,300 feet along this route – roughly eight times the height of Niagara Falls – the project would become a primary source of cheap hydroelectric power.

That power could, in turn, be used to help desalinate the salt water. Port facilities and industrial installations that currently clutter the precious beaches of Eilat and Aqaba could be moved to a man-made harbor 30 kilometres inland, Drori said, leaving the twin Red Sea cities free to become a true touristic Riviera.

Drori's eyes gleamed with unbridled optimism as he told us of new Israeli technological innovations involving pressurized water and elaborate systems of plastic hoses that could result in an inexpensive method of desalinating ocean water within five years.

The deserts of the Middle East, he exclaimed, could be made to bloom!

Israeli engineers have also explored the feasibility of building a so-called "Med-Dead" canal from the Mediterranean Sea to the Dead Sea. Such projects, however, require the cooperation of all parties in the region, Drori said. They can be accomplished only with the advent of a true and lasting peace in the Middle East, a peace, Drori said, that is well within our power to achieve.

Beit Ha'Yotzir, located in Neve Zohar, is open to visitors by appointment only. 07-658-4158.

This week...

Julia Blum, who gave up a promising Hollywood career to embrace Orthodoxy, will perform her original compositions on March 15 at the Vaughan City Playhouse, Thornhill.

Blum grew up in Los Angeles and had the lead in many Beverly Hills High School productions. After graduating from Yale university, where she majored in film studies, she travelled to Europe and Israel.

On a trip to the Kotel, Blum spent Shabbat with an Orthodox family. The discussion was invigorating enough to inspire her to undertake a religious quest and she enrolled for three months in Neve Yerushalyim Women's Seminary.

"I was constantly stimulated by the learning," she said. "Harvard and Yale prepared me to study Torah."

It is this struggle that Blum shares with her audience. "The message is profound," she says, "but not pedantic. Music makes it non-threatening because the music is contemporary with varied styles. It's hip. Music touches something inside where one song can speak volumes. These are my songs."

An Evening with the Stars for women featuring Julia Blum is sponsored by Lubavitch Women's Organizations of Toronto, Markham and Israel Community.

CBC Newsworld is presenting the award-winning documentary Revenge on The Passionate Eye, March 15 at 8 p.m.

Revenge delves into the true story of Holocaust survivors who join together, determined to punish "a nation of murderers" for what was done to their families and friends.

Revenge reveals startling accounts of strategies for retaliation developed by a group of avengers. Under the leadership of the charismatic young poet and partisan, Aba Kovner, the group resolves to track down known Nazis and – without the benefit of a judge or jury – simply execute them.

Now for the first time, the avengers describe how they conducted a campaign of mass murder with the help of British and American intelligence.

Tzedakah box also serves as a perpetual calendar

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Six years ago, David Marx set out to make an absolutely unique metal tzedakah box by incorporating a perpetual calendar into its design.

Marx said that shortly after joining the family scrap metal recycling business 21 years ago, he began collecting old lockable ornamental metal boxes hand-crafted by artisans and was inspired to take up metal-craft as a hobby.

He made his first commemorative box in 1981 on the occasion of his marriage to French horn player Carol Faibish.

After studying at Kollel Avrechim for several years, Marx decided to make a tzedakah box for the centre in gratitude for the greater sense of Yiddishkeit he had developed there. "I wanted to do something to thank them that would last," he said.

Completed in 1992, the box was made of polished brass and copper with a rounded dome lid. Marx said he enjoyed the project so much he decided to do another tzedakah box.

"I had found my calling. I realized I could make wonderful tzedakah boxes, because I was willing to devote the time. I set it as a personal goal to make the most extraordinary tzedakah box ever made."

Marx, whose late father Karl was a Holocaust survivor, said he wanted his box, a commemorative piece for his grandchildren and their grandchildren to be a "silent witness to the richness of the Jewish world and the richness of Jewish life" in Canada, where, he said, Jews have more freedom than Jews ever had before.

"This is a golden age we're living in. I wanted to contribute something that would last from this Jewish world I'm living in. When I leave this world, the box will still be here."

Marx wanted to put a perpetual calendar on the lid of the box, made of polished brass plate with gold and silver inlay, but discovered that "a charity box with a perpetual calendar had never been done."

Initially, he estimated that he would complete the project in a year, but it took five years to research, design and execute it.

Working with The Comprehensive Hebrew Calendar by Arthur Spier, a book that laid out 200 years of the calendar, Marx determined that each year, both in the Hebrew and Gregorian calendars, fell into one of 14 repeatable patterns.

There are also 12 different sequences for the Jewish holidays, he said.

He synthesized all the information, incorporating the two calendars on a single plane. The perpetual calendar, roughly one foot in diameter, is made up of two concentric circular dials divided into 15 equal pie-shaped segments.

Fourteen of those segments represent the 14 calendar configurations and list all the corresponding Jewish and Hebrew years. The 15th and lowest segment is cut away to expose a traditional monthly calendar divided into the seven days of the week.

However, it's a rolling calendar, which changes as the pointer of the mobile inner dial is moved to line up with the specific month of a particular year's configuration. The months of the year for both the Hebrew and Gregorian calendars can be found on the fixed outer rings of the dial. Each of the 14 segments listing the years is subdivided to indicate the months of the year.

On the back of the box is a chronological list of 200 years (from 1900 to 2100), indicating which sequence or segment number the year falls into, as well as the holiday pattern.

Marx said that, as he worked, he added additional elements to the box. He made a coin receiver with a star of David in gold inlay and lapis. He then added bronze dividers that lift out to give information about his and his wife's families.

For example, he has included the certificate number of his grandfather's death certificate from Theresienstadt and his grandmother's transport number from there to Auschwitz.

"These are key pieces of information for the future. These are things that would otherwise have been lost to future generations of my family," he said. "I want my grandchildren to know that their ancestors paid with their lives for being Jewish. They should never take their liberty in Canada for granted."

'People's president' re-elected

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

Ezer Weizman was re-elected last Wednesday to a second five-year term as president of Israel. Although the political pundits had forecast a close race, Weizman gained a comfortable majority over his rival, Shaul Amor.

Israeli presidents are elected in a secret ballot by the members of the 120-seat Knesset. The fact that it is the Knesset members who choose a president explains why the election is so political.

When Weizman was first elected, he was the candidate of the then-ruling Labor government. He had an impressive record of public service, having been a war hero, head of the Israel Air Force and a minister in the Labor government.

Weizman's first term in office saw the fall of the Labor government and the coming to power of the Likud-led right-wing government under Benjamin Netanyahu. As far as the public was concerned, Weizman was a generally popular president. Some estimates of his popularity are reflected in a recent opinion poll, which concluded that, if Weizman were elected by a vote of the general public rather than by politicians, he would receive over 75 percent of the popular vote.

Although the position of the Israeli president is for the most part ceremonial, Weizman has often used his position to speak out on matters of serious public concern. He did not mind if he caused embarrassment to any incumbent government.

Opinion

It was Weizman's outspoken comments, particularly on the peace process, that encouraged Netanyahu to try to stop him from being re-elected. When it is considered that the vote for president is usually very much along party lines, the fact that Weizman received 63 votes and Amor, representing the majority coalition, received only 49, shows that Netanyahu failed miserably. It can only be supposed that some 15 coalition members broke party lines and voted for Weizman.

Another unusual aspect of the election was the stature of the two candidates. If Netanyahu had really wanted to succeed in stopping an incumbent president from serving a second term, one would have expected him to field a more qualified candidate. It was generally believed that Netanyahu offered Amor the opportunity to stand for president as compensation for not giving him a ministerial post.

Before the presidential race, the Moroccan-born Amor, who at 53 is some 20 years younger than Weizman, was virtually unknown outside Israel. Even many Israelis could not tell you much about him. Although he was not a well-known public figure, as mayor of the northern town of Migdal Ha'emek he has managed to initiate a revival in the town's poor unemployment record by encouraging several high-tech companies to establish factories there. He has a reputation as a hard working, caring man with few political enemies.

However he and his supporters made the mistake of playing the ethnic card, which actually played against him, since the last thing Israel needs now is a president elected on an ethnic vote, when the trend is to unify the people as one family.

It soon became clear that Netanyahu had made a bad error in judgment. The more he canvassed for Amor's nomination the more likely it became that Weizman would receive a second term. Netanyahu's obsession with unseating Weizman, the peoples' president, was therefore doomed to failure.

Both Weizman and Amor conducted themselves with dignity before and after the election. Both men refused to be drawn by the media into conjecturing about what might happen in the election itself.

As election day drew nearer, Netanyahu tried to persuade the coalition to vote for Amor, but the personality, popularity and record of Weizman were unassailable. It was clear that now Israel needed a strong president and the Knesset vote reflected this need.

Furthermore, Amor's ethnic gamble did not pay off. Several Knesset members were very uncomfortable that the ethnic question, which had plagued politics in Israel, was now to become part of a presidential election.

With the election over and Weizman now president for another five-year term, some Knesset members are asking for a change in the election law. They would like to see the vote be an open rather than a secret one. Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi said the status of the Knesset and the image of its members were tarnished over the election procedure. Hanegbi said the public had the right to know how its elected officials voted on each and every issue, particularly on issues with important national repercussions.

Defenceman Buller made all-star as a rookie

By CHUCK O'DONNELL
Special to The CJN

BRIDGEWATER, Conn. — When Hy Buller patrolled the blue line at Madison Square Garden in the early 1950s, he wasn't representing just the New York Rangers. When he lined up to check the likes of Gordie Howe or Jean Beliveau or any of the other Original Six stars, he was representing every Jew who ever wished he was NHL material.

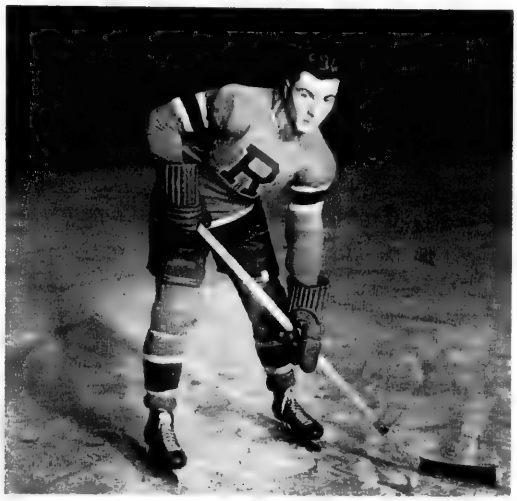
The Rangers' large Jewish following felt naches when Buller stepped on the ice. Being Jewish meant Buller would be an automatic hero to a large part of the Rangers' fan base. With the fans behind him, Buller was an NHL second-team All-Star as a rookie, making him one of the top four defencemen in the world.

Being a Jew also meant he was more likely to become a target on the ice, though it is nearly impossible to prove that anti-Semitism motivated the attacks. Did Maple Leafs' forward Gus Mortson swing his stick and kick Buller because he was a Jew? Did Ted Lindsay viciously wield his stick twice at Buller's head because he was a Jew? Was the mild-mannered Buller forced into so many altercations as a rookie – he led the team in penalty minutes – because he was a Jew?

Maybe, maybe not. But this is known. Just two years after his amazing rookie year, Buller abruptly quit the game while still in his prime. Some say the incident with Lindsay was the catalyst. He went from one of the best hockey players in the world to selling ball bearings in Cleveland.

"We were surprised to hear he was retiring," said former Ranger goalie great Chuck Rayner, who grew up in Saskatoon, the Buller family's hometown. "He was one of the best defencemen in the league. He could really rush the puck. He was steady, almost underrated. He was a real smooth skater, a good stickhandler and a real good playmaker."

Buller was born in Montreal on March 15, 1926, but his family moved to Saskatoon when he was three. He played peewee hockey when he was 10 but he also excelled in track, football, softball and swimming. At 15 he was a defenceman with the Saskatoon Quakers, a junior club. When he wasn't busy with sports, he had his share of fights with other kids, who would pick on him because he was a Jew.



Hy Buller

Buller started his pro career with the Rangers' farm team, the New York Rovers, when he was 16. He was sold to the Detroit Red Wings the next season. He played eight years in the American Hockey League, which at the time was just a half rung lower than the NHL in talent and pay. His time in the minors was interrupted by two short stints with the Red Wings. He played seven games as a 17-year-old rookie in the 1943-44 season. The next year, he played just two games with Detroit.

He was sold to Hershey, where he played for three years. From Hershey, he was traded to the Cleveland Barons for two former Rangers, Babe Pratt and Joe Cooper.

In Cleveland, Buller's career really took off. He was a perennial All-Star.

Several teams dangled players in front of Barons' boss Jim Hendy, but Hendy didn't want to part with Buller. And Buller didn't want to leave. He had a nice off-season job selling sporting equipment.

Finally, in 1951 the Rangers pried Buller and Wally Hergesheimer away from Cleveland for six players and a wad of cash.

Buller was worth every penny. In his first season with the Rangers, 1951-52, only Red Kelly (47 points) scored more than Buller (35 points) among defencemen. Those 35 points tied a team record. His second year was much the same. Buller finished tied for fourth in team scoring with 25 points and he played in the All-Star Game.

"If you had to compare him to a contemporary player, he was a lot like Bruce Driver in his prime," said veteran hockey writer Stan Fischler. "He was about the same size. He had a good shot. He was really smart with the puck. Buller used his body a little more than Driver. He was more muscular. His puckrushing I would compare to Ken Morrow...He was a complete defenceman."

Rangers Hall of Famer Edgar Laprade said "He arrived from Cleveland with quite a reputation as a good player. He was really good on the point. Some people would get rattled when they got the puck and the point, but he was very cool and he took his time. He never let a wild shot go at the net."

Jewish Rangers fans identified with him. Buller took his family to weekly services, refused to play on Yom Kippur and was active in the B'nai Brith organization.

But there were tough times for Buller as well. Rarely physical and not one to pick a fight, the brown-eyed, dark-haired Buller led the team in penalty minutes in his first two years because he was challenged so often.

In his rookie year, Buller was involved in a stick-swinging and kicking incident with Mortson. The league held a hearing, but Mortson was spared suspension because Buller testified he didn't think Mortson tried to deliberately hurt him.

In his third and final year with the Rangers, Buller clashed with Lindsay. In a game in Detroit, Buller checked Lindsay cleanly into the boards. "Terrible Ted" made a beeline for Buller and took a vicious baseball swing above Buller's head with his stick. Buller continued to skate. Lindsay did it again, coming a little closer to Buller's head. Buller skated away without retaliating.

When reached at his home in Michigan, Lindsay said he did not remember the incident. He did remember Buller, calling him "a very good defenceman." When told some people believed he went after Buller because of the Ranger's religion, Lindsay disagreed. "That's not true," he said. "I hated everyone."

Fischler and others believe Buller was never the same after the incident.

Unfortunately, we can't ask Buller what really happened. He died of cancer at age 42. But the Buller family said Hy never complained of anti-Semitism. They say he didn't retire because of intimidation. Rather, he was losing some of the spring in his stride after 13 pro seasons.

If he'd hung on for one or two years, history might have remembered him differently. Just before he quit the game, he was traded to the Montreal Canadiens but he chose not to report. That legendary Habs team went on to win five consecutive Stanley Cups.

The Inside Back

No Purim schpiel here... my kids love the Beatles

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

The first time I saw Help!, I almost cried. Sitting in the now-defunct Capitol theatre in Montreal with my Beatle-maniac sister, I couldn't bear the thought of this wondrous mish-mash – whose plot I now realize was too absurd and dialogue too witty for an 8-year-old – coming to an end. Nooo... It just had to go on. More songs! More sidelong glances from John! More befuddled looks from Ringo! Oh, the pain of those house-lights! Who else but me could appreciate the Beatles this much?

My 7-year-old daughter, as it turns out.

For Emma, the Fab Four may as well be from the same era as Haydn or cave paintings, but their allure to her musical ears warms my aging heart. It began innocently enough two years ago, following a long car trip during which Sharon, Lois and Bram (with Barney in between) were replaced by John, Paul, George and Ringo.

"More Beee-tles!" she cried from the back seat, as soon as Beatlemania and Long Tall Sally unspooled. No sweat. I had taped all the early stuff from my sister's now-valuable collection of thick and scratchy Beatles LPs, in all their glorious mono sound (and, in a nifty twist, on the Capitol label, recalling the theatre of my childhood anguish).

So next came the soundtrack to Help! and within a few hours, she had picked up most of the lyrics, albeit with some howlers. Instead of John Lennon's plaintive, "Now I find I've changed my mind and opened up the door" in the title track, Emma gave us, "I hoped they locked the door."

A slew of questions accompanied all this: "Why do the Beatles need help?" "Why do they have to hide their love away?" And this one from my 9-year-old son, the tone-deaf jock: "Why does Paul want to be treated like the night before?" (Antiseptic parental answer: "Because he was probably treated very nicely. You see? You should always treat people nicely.")

I knew this was more than an infatuation when Emma, then five, distilled all her awesome wisdom into one brief, shining statement, the kind only 5-year-olds are capable of (not four, not six): "Daddy, the man who shot John shouldn't go to jail, because he's sick." So Mark David Chapman is forgiven, and John, whose death has genuinely saddened her, has remained her favorite Beatle because "he has a good voice, and he's sorta cute."

Then came the videos. Apart from Help!, we have A Hard Day's Night ("Where's the color?"); Magical Mystery Tour ("I don't understand this one..."); and a documentary called The Compleat Beatles. The kids have even made an effort to slog through the definitive eight-tape, 10-hour Beatles Anthology. Could they be the only under-10s in the world to know that the working title of Paul McCartney's Yesterday was Scrambled Eggs?

Unlike her friends, who have gone ga-ga over the Backstreet Boys and the Spice Girls, my daughter has now embraced another old chestnut, the 20-year-old film version of Grease, with John Travolta and Olivia Newton-John. Day and night, we are treated to musical renditions of fast cars and faster girls. The first time was, um, interesting.

My scalp shrank.

"What did you say?" I managed.

"You'd better shape up," she warbled, "'cause I neeeed a man..."

I am now fully prepared for her first date. To the poor fellow, I will calmly say, "I have a gun, and a shovel."

Ah well, never mind. The kids are enjoying the same music I loved (give or take Disco Inferno) – something I can't say is true of me and the music my parents listened to (I love jazz and Big Band, but I never developed a taste for Mahler or Fidelio).

Now, on those long and winding roads, when those high little voices are keeping near-perfect accompaniment to She Loves You and Please Please Me, the warmth I feel on my face must surely be John Lennon's approval.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am 87 years old and I need help to go to doctors' appointments. My daughter lives in Toronto and my son and his family live in Vancouver. I have a sister and a brother living in Montreal who cannot help out. My sister herself has trouble going out and my brother used to take me everywhere, but his health recently has not been good and he is having trouble with his eyes. We have tried to schedule appointments when my daughter visits but that does not always work out since she is here mostly on weekends because she works. I have tried to phone local agencies but they have not been helpful. Can you find me someone to take me to my appointments? I cannot put off seeing my doctors any longer.

MR

Dear MR,

You are not clear as to why you need help to get to your medical appointments. If, for example, you are not able to use public transportation, can you take a taxi on your own or do you require assistance? An assessment can be done to determine what your needs are and what services may be available for you - ie., government assisted transportation, subsidized taxi tickets or volunteer assistance. Do not give up in your quest for assistance. It is advisable to first seek out some answers from your local community health centre or seniors centre. A social worker would be the best person to take a look at your individual needs and help you decide on the best course of action for you.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Vatican apologizes for Holocaust inaction

CJN Wire Services

THE VATICAN — In a long-awaited statement, the Roman Catholic church apologized Monday for church members who failed to do enough to help Jews against Nazi persecution.

The Church urged its followers to repent for past mistakes, but absolved wartime Pope Pius XII of allegations that he ignored the plight of Jews during the Holocaust.

The historic 14-page document entitled We Remember, a Reflection on the Shoah decries the "unspeakable tragedy…of the killing of millions of Jews," and speaks of the "moral imperative" Catholics should have to ensure it never happens again.

Cardinal Edward Cassidy, head of the Vatican Commission for Religious Relations with Jews, told a news conference the document is "more than an apology" to the Jews.

"This is an act of repentance. This is more than an apology, since as members of the Church, we are linked to the sins as well as to the merits of all her children," he said.

"We feel that we have to repent, not only for what we have done individually, but also for those members of our Church who failed in this regard."

The landmark statement was 11 years in the making. It absolves Pope Pius on charges that he turned a blind eye to genocide.

Cardinal Cassidy said he did not know whether the case of Pope Pius XII would be taken up again in the future.

He said he was satisfied that Church historians had studied the period thoroughly, and "their conclusions [are] that Pius XII does not have a case to answer."

In the document's brief introduction, Pope John Paul said the Holocaust would forever remain "an indelible stain" on history, and urged Catholics to "examine themselves for the responsibility which they too have for the evils of our time."

The Pope said he hoped the document would "help to heal the wounds of past misunderstandings and injustices."

The Pope did not mention Pope Pius XII, but the document defends the wartime pontiff from accusations that he could have done more to help Jews.

"During and after the war, Jewish communities and Jewish leaders expressed their thanks for all that had been done for them, including what Pope Pius XII did personally or through his representatives to save hundreds of thousands of Jewish lives," the document says.

Waiting for the Court

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Supreme Court of Canada is currently deliberating on what may well be the most important issue facing Canadian nationhood: whether it is legal for Quebec to unilaterally separate from Canada.

Experts Comment

The federal government, vowing after the 1995 referendum that it would never again be caught flat-footed in its defence of the territorial and political integrity of Canada, has turned to the court to rule on three questions: Under the Constitution, can Quebec secede from Canada unilaterally? Does international law permit Quebec to unilaterally separate? In the event of a conflict between Canadian and international law, which prevails?

Last month, the court heard four days of legal argument from lawyers representing the federal, provincial and territorial governments, aboriginal peoples and other groups. After oral presentations, the court posed questions for counsels' written submissions as well.

When Quebec refused to take part in the case, the court appointed counsel to represent the province. Quebec has dismissed the case out of hand, charging that it is further federal interference with the democratic rights of all Quebecers, and vows that whatever the court's judgment, it will not be recognized in Quebec.

ISRAEL

Israel May Free Prisoners

JERUSALEM — Israel is preparing for a possible prisoner amnesty linked to the Jewish state's 50th anniversary.

Representatives from the Justice Ministry and the President's Office met last week to discuss how to process the cases of some 6,300 prisoners, not including security prisoners, who will be up for review.

Pollard Case

JERUSALEM — Israel may be on the verge of making a dramatic decision in the case of Jonathan Pollard.

Cabinet Secretary Danny Naveh said the government would step up efforts to free Pollard from a U.S. prison, but has not yet decided whether to recognize him as an Israeli agent.

His comments came after an Israeli newspaper said Israel would soon acknowledge that Pollard, a former U.S. Navy intelligence analyst, was working for the Jewish state.

Immigration Figures

JERUSALEM — The Central Bureau of Statistics recently released final aliyah figures for 1997: 66,000 from the entire world, with 54,600 – 83 percent – of those coming from the former Soviet Union.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel must continue to attract new immigrants, until the majority of the world's Jews live there. He predicted that Israel will one day be one of the richest countries of the world, and said that immigration is the key to achieving that goal.

Killer Praised

JERUSALEM — Right-wing Jewish extremists distributed a pamphlet last week justifying the killing of 29 Muslim worshippers at Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs four years ago.

The pamphlet was titled, Baruch, the Redeemer and Savior, a reference to Dr. Baruch Goldstein, the Kiryat Arba settler who carried out the massacre before being beaten to death by survivors.

WORLD

Anti-Semitic Incidents

NEW YORK — The number of anti-Semitic incidents reported in the United States has declined for a third consecutive year, according to the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

In 1997, 1,571 incidents were reported by 43 states and the District of Columbia – 151 fewer than in 1996, or nearly a nine percent decline, the ADL reported in its annual audit released last week.

ADL officials say that the downward trend – the 1997 statistics are the lowest since 1989 – foretells a time when hate crimes will cease to exist.

Nazi-era Records

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Senate will soon be taking up legislation that would open to the public all American records on Nazi war criminals and stolen assets of Holocaust victims.

The Nazi War Crimes Disclosure Act, approved unanimously by the Senate Judiciary Committee, would amend the Freedom of Information Act to ease the release of Nazi-era records, while creating a special interagency group to identify, declassify and make available to the public all Nazi war records held by the government.

Nazi-looted Assets

PARIS — France has adopted new measures to track down millions of dollars worth of bank accounts and other financial assets looted from Jews during the Nazi occupation of the country.

Shul Restoration

NEW YORK — Shanghai is preparing to restore the historic Ohel Rachel Synagogue located in the city centre. Currently occupied by the Board of Education for Shanghai, the synagogue will be declared a historic landmark and will be vacated in the coming months. The shul was founded in 1921.

Special Hagaddahs

NEW YORK — The Jewish Heritage for the Blind is making large print Passover Hagaddahs available for free for those who are visually impaired.

Fax or mail a note from your eye-care specialist describing your condition to The Jewish Heritage for the Blind, 1655 East 24th St. Brooklyn, NY 11228 or fax 718-338-0653.

Blind individuals are to contact the office as well, for a complimentary copy of the Braille Haggadah.

Story on Orthodox a Hoax

JERUSALEM — An Israeli newspaper has admitted that its report on an incident in an Orthodox community was fabricated – and the reporter who wrote the story has resigned.

Yediot Achronot published a retraction last week, admitting that rumors were the source of its story about a religious court in Bnei Brak forcing a man to divorce his wife because she was raped.

The story, denounced last week by a Bnei Brak rabbi as a hoax, had caused an uproar among Orthodox Jews. It also drew protests from Israeli women's groups.

The Centre for Jewish Information filed a complaint with a journalists association against the reporter who wrote the story, saying he acted on rumors that were not thoroughly checked.

An investigation by another Israeli newspaper, Ha'aretz, found the story to be untrue.

The Ha'aretz reporter, appearing on Israel Television, said she tried for a week to locate the woman referred to in the Yediot report and learned that a rumor about a similar incident had been circulating for some time.

Campaign against child poverty raises $40,000

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People donating all or part of their Ontario income tax cut have already raised $40,000 to fight child poverty in the province.

Spearheading the campaign is Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld and a committee at Temple Emanu-El.

"We had no idea the public would respond so generously," Rabbi Bielfeld said.

The three major recipients are Mazon Canada, the United Way and Jewish Family and Child Service.

The plight of 500,000 poor children in Ontario is a tragic one, Rabbi Bielfeld said, noting that many churches and synagogues have joined the non-denominational campaign.

Temple Emanu-El has circulated tables showing that Ontario residents with less than two dependants will save $230 in 1997 and $299 in 1998 if their taxable income is $20,000. If the income is $40,000, the cut is $664 in 1997 and $863 in 1998.

When taxable income rises to $80,000, the saving is $1,558 this year and $2,040 next. At the $100,000 level, the cut is $1,866 in 1997 and $2,498 in 1998.

The tax tables, which cover all taxable incomes up to $300,000, are available from Temple Emanu-El, 449-3880 or from chartered accountants Chapman, Matten, Welton, Forster and Winter, 488-6275

This $6-billion tax reduction in Ontario, over a period of three years, is being achieved at the cost of poor children and ultimately of taxpayers themselves, who will have to pay the social costs related to deprived children.

This is the message of a proposed double-page daily newspaper ad. Six hundred families have already pledged $25 towards the ad and "we need another 400 contributions of $25 to break even. Considering the reluctance of Canadians to have their names listed in an ad, this is quite remarkable," said Rabbi Bielfeld.

As the campaign goes on, he said he hopes it will fund a national media drive to educate people about the tragic results of child poverty in Canada and to convince governments at all levels to adopt policies to prevent it.

Recently the board of Temple Emanu-El voted to urge the federal government to eliminate federal income tax on all earnings below the poverty line and substantially increase the National Child Benefit.

At the same time, it asked Ottawa to increase substantially the refundable GST credit payable to poor families, and to increase its social transfers (health and welfare) to the provinces and territories. It also wants measures taken to ensure that every province uses the new money to alleviate poverty.

Official anti-Semitism

Two weeks ago in this space, before the Purim "interruption," I wrote about the failure by the western media to critically examine violations by the Palestine Authority (PA) of the Oslo agreement. I pointed specifically to the unceasing violation by the PA of its commitment not to incite hatred or violence against Israel.

The commitments are quite clear. Israel and the PA have promised that they "shall seek to foster mutual understanding and tolerance and shall accordingly abstain from incitement, including hostile propaganda against each other and, without derogating from the principle of freedom of expression, shall take legal measures to prevent such incitement by any organizations, groups or individuals within their jurisdiction."

"Yasser Arafat sanctions the most odious expressions of vile, crude, tasteless anti-Semitism against Israelis and Jews by his officials and journalists," I wrote two weeks ago.

As promised, I am reproducing a small sampling of the anti-Semitism that emanates from the PA.

The material has been compiled by the government of Israel into what is sadly, but appropriately, called a compendium of hate. The material is organized into six different categories.

I offer a warning to readers: what follows is very difficult to read.

Anti-Semitic stereotypes

"The Jews always set a trap for the community of Muslims. The Koran repeatedly warns against the traps and plots of the 'people of the Book.' They relentlessly scheme in all times and places and this is what they do today and tomorrow against the Muslim camp."

(Excerpted from the weekly Friday prayer sermon at Al-Aqsa mosque broadcast on the official PA radio station, the Voice of Palestine, Oct. 24, 1997)

Israel as Nazi

"The appearance of the Zionist movement prompted the emergence of terrorist, racist ideologies, such as, the Nazi ideology. There is great similarity between the two ideologies: the Zionists believe that they are 'God's Chosen People,' and that other nations were created to be used and ridiculed... After the passing of 100 years since the establishment of Zionism, here comes Benjamin Netanyahu, the prime minister of the Zionist enemy, and presents a Nazi formula when he says that 'peace between Israel and the Arabs must be based on the principle of Israeli strength.' Since its establishment, the racist Zionist entity has been implementing various forms of terrorism on a daily basis which are a repetition of the Nazi terror. This proves the shared roots of Nazism and Zionist thought..."

Holocaust denial

"They have profited materially, spiritually, politically and economically from the talk about the Nazi killings. This investment is favorable to them and they view it as a profitable activity so they inflate the number of victims all the time. In another 10 years, I do not know what number they will reach. Last year, for the first time, a statistic appeared according to which one million children were killed by the Nazis. The number was not previously known..."

(From a cultural affairs program broadcast on the official PA television station on Aug. 25, 1997.)

Libelous accusations...

"In order to establish the Temple in place of the Al-Aqsa mosque, Israel employed different methods starting with arson attempts, destruction and the digging of tunnels and ending with the creation of artificial earthquakes that can be triggered from afar..."

(From an article entitled "AL-Aqsa Surrounded by Conspiracies" that appeared in the official PA newspaper Al-Hayat Al-Jadeedah, Oct. 26, 1997.)

Delegitimizing Israel and Judaism

"The 'Al-Buraq' Wall (the Western Wall) is a part of the Al-Aqsa mosque. The Jews have no relation to it, whether or not a decision to expropriate it was made."

(PA Mufti Ikrama Sabri in the daily newspaper Al-Ayyam, Nov. 22, 1997.)

Equating Zionism with Racism

"When the UN General Assembly defined Zionism as a form of racism, it expressed this as a fact...Zionism remains...another face of racism despite all the pressure the United States has put in order to change the UN decision or to cancel it...Accordingly, we are facing a Zionist ideology which belongs to a dynasty of dinosaurs. And if human history has swallowed all the dynasties of dinosauran ideologies from Hulagu (the Mongolian conqueror) to Hitler, in addition to the racist ideology in South Africa, the survival of Zionist ideology on this piece of our planet, is a deviant phenomenon and a historical lie.."

Arafat promised "to foster mutual understanding and tolerance..." His actions show how he keeps the promise.

Rather than leading his people, seeking a way out of the dark alleyways, to turn the corner away from prejudice-laden attitudes and stereotypes, Arafat, in essence, encourages them to set up permanent residence there, in ignorant suspicion and hatred, far removed from a brighter, more enlightened world.

Merrymakers enjoy Purim at community centres

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The recent Purim parties at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) and the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) drew hundreds of costumed merrymakers, among them, dozens of Queen Esthers in various shapes and sizes.

Some 500 people attended the Purim carnival at the Bloor JCC, which was sponsored by the JCC, Ashkenaz: a Festival of New Yiddish Culture and the Downtown Jewish Community Council (DJCC).

The gym was turned into a colorful bazaar of purim booths sponsored by many of the DJCC's member organizations, including the Beaches shul's Pin-the-hat-on-Haman booth, the Narayever shul's Scrabble and puzzles, and the Downtown Jewish Community School's Haman-hockey and can-toss booths.

The Bloor JCC seniors group served hot dogs and hamburgers along with plenty of hamantaschen, and Bubbie Purim, as she preferred to be called, manned the face-painting booth.

Ann Barber and Brad Harley of Shadowland coordinated the community volunteers who decorated the game booths and the gym.

Barber and Harley also participated in the Purim Shpiel with Anni Szamosi, raconteur Michael Wex and klezmer musicians David Bookbinder and Dave Wall. Other musical entertainment was provided by singer Lenka Lichtenberg, who taught songs, and Rachel Sheinin, a fiddle-playing wandering minstrel.

JCC program director Florence Marantz told The CJN she felt the Purim party was a big success. "It had a real heimish feel to it. It was visually spectacular. The attendance was excellent and the kids got into the spirit with costumes."

Leehee Louie, 6, enjoys cotton candy at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

She enthused about the participation level of community groups, noting that students from Youthdale and the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union, were among the volunteers running booths.

She said Ashkenaz and the JCC have been celebrating holidays together and the two organizations complement each other well. "It's the best of both worlds for both of us. It's a good partnership."

Further north in the city, festivities at the Purim bash sponsored by the BJC, UJA Federation, the Junior UJA Club and the Toronto Dominion Bank offered a fun-filled afternoon chockfull of entertainment and games.

In the balloon-festooned gym, children tried their luck at such carnival games as hockey, ring toss, basketball and bowling, pocketing an assortment of prizes as they nashed on hamantaschen, hot dogs, and cotton candy.

The highlights of the afternoon included a concert by musician Eli Brown and a performance of a Purim play by the Intergenerational Players, a group made up of BJC's senior members and kindergarten students in the BJC's preschool program.

The BJC director of group services Janis Roth said she was thrilled with the turnout of well over 400 people.

She said she was extremely pleased with the contribution of volunteers and staff who designed and manned the carnival booths.

Volunteer groups included students from Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), participants in the Community Integration Program, the preschool parent committee and Hands on Toronto, a UJA Federation volunteer group of young professionals.

BJC executive director Deborah Pinsky said in the past, the centre had rented carnival booths for Purim, but this year was the first time the BJC created its own games.

"People had a sense of ownership," she said. "It was much more heimish than before."
